THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Farmers Must Have Better Prices for Milk or they Will Stop Producing it

MILK is subject to the prevailing conditions that have raised the cost of all products and is also affected by special factors of increased expense which do not apply to any other article on the market. Among the general causes may be mentioned the higher cost of feed, labor, land, fertilizers and taxes besides the price of cows having doubled in recent years. Added to these is the public demand for milk of better quality, cleaner and more sanitary enforced by State laws and municipal ordinances which are becoming more exacting in their requirements and add considerably to the cost of production.

These regulations are indispensable to the protection of public health, for there is no more dangerous carrier of disease than impure, dirty or carelessly handled milk. The public have a right to insist on compliance with advanced standards of quality and purity, but as it costs more money the consumers must pay the bill in higher priced milk and not expect to throw the burden on the farmers and dairymen.

The price of milk has risen but not in proportion to the cost of production; so say the dairymen who are now demanding another small advance in price. After a short contest Boston yielded to the farmers but New York City dealers refused to pay the additional 45 cents per hundred pounds; consequently the farmers belonging to the Dairymen's Association have stopped shipments and the great metropolis is suffering a milk famine. The small supply which reaches the city from other sources is distributed to the hospitals and to families having young children. The scarcity is such that five hundred women with babies in arms recently mobbed one of the public milk depots in their frantic efforts to secure a preference for their own offspring in the distribution that was being made, and the police had to be called to restore order.

As usual in such cases, the city and State authorities are seeking popularity by proposing to relieve the situation through investigations and legal proceedings against the associated dairymen. The futility of such action is apparent from the known fact that dairy farming is on the decline through New England and other Eastern States because of continually diminishing profits which with many former milk producers have reached the vanishing point and forced them to sell their cows and substitute some other line of agriculture. It is proper to establish legal standards of quality and purity, but we question the constitutional power to regulate prices by law, and an attempt to do so, even if permissible, would be absurdly abortive of practical results as to milk, for if the price did not yield the farmers a living profit they would beef their cows and stop producing milk. The only rational solution of the milk problem is to pay the farmers their price, which is not exorbitant. If you don't believe it, keep a cow yourself and see what it costs.

Proposals to Lower Food Prices at the Expense of the Farmers

ANOTHER manifestation of the pernicious tendency toward legal interference with private business is the present agitation in favor of a nation-wide embargo to stop the exportation of wheat and flour from the United States as a means of lowering the price of wheat, flour and bread in this country. Doubtless such a measure would accomplish the purpose, but it would be a flagrant abuse of power, a shameful piece of class legislation designed to benefit certain classes at the expense of others, an oppressive violation of natural right and a partial confiscation of honestly acquired private property. We believe the "Bill of Rights" in the Federal Constitution nullifies legislation of that sort.

Do not confuse the moral and legal aspect of the proposed wheat embargo with that of the antitrust legislation aimed at the prevention of control of the market by monopolistic combinations. The purpose of our antitrust laws is to insure free operation of the natural law of supply and demand as a determining factor in the making of prices and in the expansion and contraction of production, and in directing the flow of the currents of trade and commerce. Apply this logic to the wheat situation.

Flour is so high that the bakers have to get six cents for the loaf which, until within a few weeks, always sold for five cents. The millers had to put the price of flour up because of the large advance in the price of wheat, which latter was caused by a short crop and an abnormal demand for foreign shipment because of the war in Europe. This is the direct result of the free operation of the law of supply and demand. The supply is short and the demand is exceptionally large, especially in Europe. As we produce a surplus of wheat for export the European market determines the price of wheat and flour in America as it does the world over. Europe is bidding for our wheat and flour, and American consumers must meet the foreigner's bids or go without. It is free competition in an open world market unaffected by trust or combination.

When the price of bread went up the consumers in our cities began to clamor for an embargo against exportation of American wheat and flour. Of course the purpose was to deprive our farmers and millers of the foreign market and hold the entire wheat crop of the country for the home market. Because we produce a surplus for export the home market would become glutted at once with no outlet for the excess, and wheat and flour prices would go to smash. This might save the city people a cent a loaf on their bread and enable the bakers to realize a larger profit, but at what a cost to the country as a whole, and at what a loss to the farmers and millers! Our wheat exports bring hundreds of millions of dollars to this country most of which is spent here for the products of our mines and factories and contributes largely to the prosperity of every line of industry and trade. The first loss would fall on such of the farmers as had not marketed their wheat and on exporters, millers and dealers who had bought of the farmers at prevailing high prices, no doubt ruining many such purchasers. The farmer takes long chances when he plants his seed and cultivates his land; often his crops fail or an abundant crop may sell below cost of production; if the chance for profit is taken from him by law what inducement is there for him to work hard and take chances of loss?

Obviously such gross injustice and great injury must not be inflicted arbitrarily on certain classes of producers and traders for the supposed benefit of the masses. Ultimately it would benefit nobody, for all would share the depressing influence of a business upheaval of such magnitude. A law which deprives a man of a market for a legitimate article of commerce for the sole purpose of reducing the price of this product takes from him and gives to the public a part of the value of his property; it is confiscation, legalized robbery, tyranny, oppression. There is no knowing to what extreme folly and disaster the establishment of such a vicious precedent might lead.

The Trudeau Treatment of Tuberculosis

THE Trudeau School of Tuberculosis has been founded in memory of the late beloved and lamented Dr. Edward Livingston Trudeau, known the world over for his wonderful success in the open air treatment of consumption, and the first to introduce that method of cure into this country. The institution is located at Saranac Lake in the Adirondacks, N. Y., where Dr. Trudeau, himself a victim of the white scourge, went into the lone wilderness for the bracing health-giving mountain air, laden with the balmy odor of the stately pine, which gave promise of checking, for a while at least, the ravages of the disease that was consuming him. He studied the white plague as no man before had studied it. He not only succeeded in building up his own frail body, but in the settlement he founded for consumptives, restored thousands to vigorous health and greatly prolonged the lives of thousands more who, but for his skill and care, would have quickly perished.

When Dr. Trudeau began his great work for humanity, consumption was regarded as incurable, and those attacked by it gave themselves up to die. Today the consumptive has not only a fighting chance, but every prospect, if the disease has not gone too far and proper treatment is at once resorted to, of getting well.

Dr. Trudeau was known as the "Pioneer" because of his ceaseless efforts to wipe out tuberculosis. As a result of his efforts a systematic campaign against tuberculosis has for years, been waged in nearly every section of our land, and the death rate from the white scourge has been greatly reduced.

It was Dr. Trudeau's aim to found a school in which men should be scientifically trained to fight humanity's grimmest terror. The departed physician's dream has been realized. The Trudeau School has begun its work with but six instructors and twenty pupils. The institution will grow as funds accumulate and the knowledge of its work spreads, until every section of the globe in which tuberculosis is prevalent will have its Trudeau expert to instruct men how to fight their greatest physical enemy. The first twenty students are picked men, and when they graduate they will take charge of a universal campaign against a scourge which is costing this country not less than $330,000,000 annually.

Sleep in a room that is well ventilated the year round, leave all alcoholic drinks strictly alone, pay attention to your diet, and you will not be one of the 160,000 victims that the tuberculosis germ gathers in each year.

COMFORT'S Twenty-Ninth Anniversary

WITH the present issue COMFORT enters the twenty-ninth year of its life—yes life is the right word, for COMFORT is more than paper and cold type. Our subscribers are kind enough to tell us that its pages breathe a sympathetic interest in their affairs that imbues it with living personality and inspires confidence that its publisher and editors are their friends.

Through the wonderful progress of invention and applied science a new world has evolved about us hardly recognizable as the same in which COMFORT was born twenty-eight years ago. New conditions have wrought marvelous changes in the manner of living and in the trend of thought. But human nature remains ever the same, stirred by the same passions, spurred by the same ambitions and inspired by the same hopes that have been the mainspring of action throughout the ages. COMFORT, too, has grown and has extended its range of endeavor and achievement, pressing "Onward and Upward" in the vanguard of progress, but it has remained steadfast in its adherence to truth and the principles of justice which are eternal and unchangeable; a zealous champion of human rights it has preached duty with equal insistence.

We thank our readers for their cordial support and their many kind expressions of good will, and we pledge our best efforts to serve their interests in general and especially in promoting the betterment of their homes and the welfare of their families.

The Thanklessness of Wyoming Sal,

by Joseph E. Novak

"What's makin' you look so happy"?

She cut green pine boughs

"How do you like me?" she asked

"Go back to the gal who's waitin' for you"

"The melancholy days are come
The saddest of the year,
Of wailing winds and naked woods
And meadows brown and sear."
William Cullen Bryant:—Death of the Flowers.

"THEY'VE been tellin' it 'round, Sal, that ye ain't goin' to keep yer place open tomorrer. Is it true?"

"Bricktop" Pete, sprawling on the counter, yawned out the question, and finished with an unearthly screech of satisfaction as he had his gape out.

"Land sake, do git off'n the counter," said Sal, giving him a shove which scarcely budged his big, heavy figure. "Smash the glasses and you'll pay fer 'em. Yes, 'strue I am. I'm agoin' to have at least one holiday a year, an' Thanksgivin' Day is a good one to have off. It'll give me a chance to think o' my blessin's and all that kind o' thing, see? Thankful fer my good health, thankful fer havin' you men treat me decent and bein' good to me, an' thankful that I ain't never done nothin' to make my mother in her grave feel ashamed o' her daughter," and Sal went to emptying cigar boxes in which but few "ropes" were felt, and putting things generally to rights, as if she meant to close up there and then. There was, however, a kind of reverence in her manner, for her speech made her a bit sober, and it perceptibly affected the loungers in the little mountain tavern.

"Wyoming Sal's" little tavern stood in the midst of an immense pine wood in a corner of the state of Montana. It had been a little wayside station in years gone by, located on a stage-coach line where the stage stopped, allowing such of the passengers as chose, to get a drink. In more recent years, a lumber syndicate had purchased the property thereabout, had set up a mill, and gone into the lumbering business. Sal's father kept the little tavern, and Sal had grown up in the rough environment of the West, and when but ten years of age, her mother had died, she became her father's helpful assistant. And when he died, two years back, and left Sal to take care of herself, she decided to continue the business, which she did, carrying it on with that shrewdity that early struggles in the battle of life had taught her. Sal was, in the language of the men, "Joe's gal," and none of them would have hesitated a moment to brave any danger that beset her. Each felt her under his special protection, and that he was to help her as much as possible in her struggle for existence. And so they patronized her little tavern, letting their dollars go into her treasury rather than into Chinese Charlie's "dope shop" as they termed the celestial's little restaurant.

No one seemed to think of Sal as a young woman, though vaguely they were aware of the fact that she was an attractive girl with a figure of no mean lines.

To Sal, beauty meant loud attractiveness, and so she decked herself in riotous colors with true instinct for the bizarre. Her hair was naturally wavy, and so she fluffed it out in the manner of pictures she had seen in magazines such as would cater to men of little culture.

The little silence which had fallen upon the gathered loungers at the girl's words, was now broken by one of them. Spoke he:

"What kind o' new notion is this Thanksgivin' one o' closin,' anyhow? Can't ye be thankful 'ithout interferin' with business?"

"Tell ye what, Blacky," spoke up another, "seems like Sal's goin' to entertain her beau to Thanksgivin' dinner!"

"Her beau? Good night! Who's her beau?" ejaculated Bricktop.

"Why, that young sport what's timekeeper fer th' company," returned Bob Rush, who first suggested the "notion" of Sal's having a beau. "I see him doin' nothin' much else in his spare time 'cept bein' here in th' tavern an' playin' solitaire."

The half dozen or more men in the tavern had become interested and were now listening for what Sal had to say.

"Ain't none o'your business what I'm goin' to do," she retorted, blushing crimson, "I guess I'm old enough to do as I like."

"Aw, don't git red-headed, Sal," pacified a fourth. "We air all int'rested in ye, an' if ye love that sporty young timekeeper what th' company's sent out, why that's all right. No one wants ter poke into your affairs, but if there's agoin' to be a weddin', we all want a bid to it, an' we'll remember ye han'some."

"Heavens! You fellers can't let a young gal look at a nice young feller, without thinkin' right off that she's dead gone on 'im. Now shut up, an' forget it. There's the bell fer supper, so go on an' feed," and with a laugh, she shooed them into the dining-room.

As they disappeared and the half-doors shut them from view, Sal went behind the counter and stood for a moment in deep reflection. They had discovered that she loved the young timekeeper from down East. Well, what did she care? Didn't gals fall in love with men when they grew up? 'Course they did! Then why shouldn't she? No reason at all!

Her cheeks burned at the thought of the handsome timekeeper, and she stole an almost shy glance at herself in the mirror behind the bar. She was amazed at how really beautiful she looked. And could the young man fail to love her? It seemed impossible that he should not, especially when all the men thought her so agreeable and were so interested in her.

As she stood there, a step outside sounded, there was a heavy stamping of feet, and then the new arrival entered. The girl looked up expectantly, and seeing who it was, smiled almost shyly, and extended her hand to him. For with the knowledge of her love and the fact that the men knew it, she was almost timid.

"Hello, Eddie," she said simply. "Want anything to eat? The men are grubbing now," and she waved toward the dining-room.

The young man's face was glowing with some untold happiness. He shook the snow from his coat, threw off his hat, and stood forth in his whip-cord suit with its Norfolk coat. He was a handsome young fellow, somewhat swarthy in complexion, and had glossy black hair. His was a splendid physique.

"How are you tonight, Sallie?" he asked, as he kicked the snow from his high-laced shoes, and went to her side. "Been pretty busy?"

"Oh, yes. You know I'm goin' to close the place tomorrer, an' so I've been puttin' thin s to rights. What's makin' you look so happy?"

"I?" His face reflected the happiness that sounded in his voice. "Ah, it is something I mean to tell you. Something I know will make you rejoice with me. Something——" he stopped then, for Bricktop came from the little dining-room from which sounds of hilarity echoed.

"Hello, Smith," Bricktop greeted, "goin' to hang 'round this evening? If ye are, we'll have a game or two."

"No, I don't think I shall. There's quite a bit of work with the accounts and books, and I want to settle them up tonight, for I must have tomorrow free."

The girl felt Bricktop's look swerve from the young fellow's face to her own, but she said nothing, and presently the young fellow said in a low tone:

"I'll tell you about it tomorrow," and picking up his hat and coat, he put them on, and bidding Bricktop and the girl a cheerful good night, he went out into the snow-storm.

Bricktop was aware of the little by-play and Sal knew it, for no sooner had Eddie Smith departed, when Pete commenced:

"Say, Sal, I ain't meanin' to poke into yer affairs, but I want to tell ye somethin'. I can't ask ye to confide in me, an' tell ye I'm old enough to be yer father, fer I ain't, but then I'm ten years older'n ye be, an' I want to look out for yer welfare. I knew yer father fer a smart long time, an' I was a kid brother to a chap what was yer father's bosom friend. I remember when he opened up this here tavern an' how we used to call him 'Wyoming Joe' 'cause he came from Wyoming, an' that's how ye got to be called 'Wyoming Sal.' An' so, ye see, I'm int'rested in ye. I know ye expect to close up yer place tomorrer, an' so I want to know if yer goin' away with that young timekeeper?"

"D'ye mean to ask me if I'm goin' to elope?" Sal queried indignantly.

"Well, no, not exzactly," he answered.

"Well, I ain't, so ye needn't worry."

"Don't git sore, Sal," he continued patiently, "I like ye, an' I don't want no harm to come to ye. What have you an' that young feller got on fer tomorrer?"

His tone was not prying, he obviously was so unselfishly disinterested, that the girl could not feel angry with him. Besides, she had always liked Bricktop better than anyone else, and he had always been kind and patient when she tried him. He it was who held her tenderly in his arms as she took her last agonized look at her dead father, and he whose comfort she had most cherished.

And so, in reply to his question, she answered:

"It's all right, Bricktop. I'll tell ye. I asked Eddie Smith to come over tomorrer an' have dinner with me. I sent fer a turkey an' all them Thanksgivin' fixin's, an' we're goin' to have a reg'lar Thanksgivin' dinner like he always used to have back down East. He told me about the stuff an' I got it. He's goin' to pay fer it all, an' I'm goin' to cook it, see? Honest, there ain't nothin' wrong in that, is there?"

"No, o'course not," Bricktop admitted. "What's it that he wants to tell ye, though?"

"Did ye hear him say that?"

Bricktop nodded.

"Well, it ain't nothin' that I know of."

"Can't ye guess?"

She bowed her head to hide the fiery crimson that mantled her cheek.

"How could I?"

"Has he ever told ye he loved ye, Sal?"

"Not yet. Maybe that's what he wants to tell me tomorrer."

"D'ye really love him, Sal?"

She looked up proudly, almost defiantly.

"Yes, I do. Gals always fall in love when they grow up, an' I guess Eddie Smith's the feller fer me. I do love him; he's good lookin' and talks so swell, an' he ain't no sissy, neither. I know that. He knocked down Brad Keegan an' Dunk Carrol one time when they tried to get fresh with him, an' any man who kin fight like he does, is a man, even if he does come from down East."

"Say, do you know who that feller is?" Bricktop went on.

She stared at him. "Who he is? Well, who should he be but Eddie Smith?"

"I ain't sure o' myself, Sal," Bricktop went on, "an' I hate to say anything unless I'm perfectly sure, but jes' th' other day when I went in to see him about somethin', an' he wasn't there, ther was a paper layin' on th' floor, an' I picked it up—guess it blowed from his desk. I looked to see if it was any good, an' I saw written on it, 'My dear son,' an' it was signed 'Melville J. Griegg.' I didn't read th' letter, 'cause it's a devil o' a thing to read somebody else's letters, but if what I think is true, that young feller ain't no Eddie Smith, but he's really th' son o' Melville J. Griegg who is president o' the syndicate that's operatin' this lumber company, an' th' young feller ain't no poor clerk like he pretends to be, but he's a millionaire's boy."

The girl looked at him, almost indifferently.

"Well, what's that? S'posin' he is a millionaire? That's nothin' bad, is it?"

"Holy sufferin' tomcats!" Bricktop ejaculated, "don't ye see that ye oughtn't to fall in love with him? Them fellers don't marry gals like you. They marry some swell ladies who's got lots o' money, an' air in soci'ty, an' all that. They on'y like gals like you to amuse them an' fer them to talk to an' so on."

Sal felt her heart sinking. She remained silent.

"Has he ever kissed ye, Sal?" Bricktop questioned as the girl continued to say nothing.

He never had, but Sal hardly cared to admit it. With Bricktop's words, she was slowly beginning to realize that he had never kissed her, nor taken her into his arms. The most he had done was to squeeze her hand now and then in a mischievous little manner, and to call her a "dear little girl," and often he had slipped her the change which she brought him from the money with which he paid for his meals.

But the thought of his glowing face that evening, his happy voice, and mein, dashed to earth any doubts, and she dismissed them instanter.

"S'pose I said he did?" she plagued.

Bricktop's look was so distressed, that Sal laughed and said:

"I mustn't say that he did, because he ain't. He's always been a decent an' polite gent, an' ain't done nothin' to make me blush. He's all right, an' I love him, an' you'll see you'll be gittin' a bid to th' weddin' afore long. S'pose he is a millionaire's son what I don't believe. He's a gentleman an' all you men like him. There ain't one o' you that kin say a word agin him. A gal can't help love a feller like that. Seems like you was jealous o' him, Bricktop," she insinuated.

"Maybe I am, Sal, an' maybe ye think I'm purty fresh when I say I'd be th' better man fer you. But it's your doin', an' nobody else's," he said with a sigh, he was young at heart, and young in years, though his hard struggle with life had made him look older than his twenty-eight years. He loved Sal, loved her dearly, there was honest passion in his love, but until Sal would show some indication of returning his affection, he would cloak his own longings. He conscientiously opposed the match Sal contemplated, simply because of his own knowledge of life, he saw the unfitness of the union.

But he said nothing more, and stayed around the tavern until it was time to close up.

Sal locked up the place, and through the snow-storm went to her home which lay somewhat beyond the confines of the lumber company.

She reached the little cabin against the door of which a drift of snow had piled, pushed it open and went in. Lighting a lamp, she went to work, for she seldom visited this cabin which her father had built during the time his wife was sick, and where that good woman had spent the last days of her life. Sal always kept the place, visiting it only once a week or so, for it was much more convenient to remain almost entirely at the tavern.

At length she had everything cleaned, dusted and arranged to her satisfaction, and went to bed. But she did not sleep, for her thoughts ran on to the morrow and what it would bring. She planned the dinner, it must appeal to Eddie, he must know what a good cook she was. And she would be stylish too, and have it ready by two o'clock in the afternoon. That would give her plenty of time to get everything ready.

She was up with the graying of the morning, and set to work again, and by the time ten o'clock rolled around, she had her arrangements almost complete. She prepared her table, then throwing on a wrap, she went out into the snow-whitened world and cut green pine boughs from the trees. Shaking the snow from them, she gathered them up and went back into the little cottage where she decorated the walls with them, giving the little room a rather festal air.

This was the final touch. Sal surveyed her arrangements with keen satisfaction, after which, she went to her dresser and brought forth her finery.

She had a white silk dress which once had been her mother's, but which she had changed from time to time to conform to such style as came to her notice. She fluffed out her hair, and fastened in several artificial flowers. Happily, she knew nothing of facial paint and rouge and so did not disfigure her complexion with such things. She found an old veil which she draped about her shoulders and waist, and with another bunch of artificial flowers her costume was complete, except that we must add the gay-beaded moccasins, several ropes of shells strung by Indians, and an ugly brooch set with paste diamonds.

She made a picture, startling, bizarre, yet at the same time with a certain wierd beauty.

Dressed, she surveyed herself complacently. She was beautiful, and Eddie Smith could not help but notice it. Was he coming yet?

She hurried to the window, and looked out across the snows. They were, as yet, unbroken by a single track. The heavy fall of yesterday had ceased, but the day was cold, the sky overcast. There would be another fall before the afternoon had ended.

She went to the stove, and found everything there satisfactory. It would be but a few moments' work to transfer the dinner to the table.

Again she went to the window and sat down and waited patiently until she descried the figure of a man plowing through the drifts. She watched him intently, and soon saw that it was Smith. On he came, and when he was within hailing distance, she hurried to the door and opened it for him.

He came up, stamped the snow from his shoes, dusted the loose snow that had accumulated on his long overcoat, and then came in, casting aside his wraps.

"How's my little Sal today?" he queried, taking her hand in his. "My, we are dressed up!"

"How do you like me?" she asked, referring to her appearance, of course.

"Very much. You're quite dashing," he teased.

"Well, the dinner's all ready, Eddie," she said, "an' I'll put it on the table right off. Say, do you know any kind o' prayer to say? We ought to say one before we eat on Thanksgiving Day, oughtn't we?"

"Indeed, yes. But really, I think the nicest prayer that we could say is, 'Father, we thank you,' and think over all the blessings and happinesses that have been bestowed upon us. I think such a prayer would be quite sufficient, don't you?"

"Yes. And we should tell what we're thankful for?" she queried.

"Why, yes. I know I have something to tell you that makes me very thankful today."

"I wonder if it's the same thing I'm thankful for?"

"The same?" There was wonder in his query.

"Yes. I'm thankful for my good health," she began, "an' I'm thankful that the men in camp are kind to me, an' that they help me keep up my business, but most o' all, I'm thankful that you came to camp here, an' that I love you."

She spoke reverently, and dropped her eyes. But when she looked up and saw the face of the man before her, her heart sank and her head grew giddy. She staggered forward. Smith caught her, but she slipped to the floor, her arms caught him spasmodically about the waist and she looked imploringly into his face. Then slowly she loosened her clasp, rose and stood off from him, regarding him with a look of despair.

"Ain't you glad, Eddie?" she queried mournfully. "I thought ye loved me, an' I, well, when ye first came, I knew I loved you."

He went to her side, and put his arm about her waist.

"Poor little girl," he murmured, "I'm so sorry; I'm so sorry! It's my fault entirely. I see what I had intended only to be kindness has been misconstrued by you. I love you, little girl, but not the way you thought I loved you. I always thought of you as a little girl, not as a woman with a woman's heart and a woman's power for love. Listen: When I first came here, I came in an agony of spirit. I had quarreled with the dearest girl in the world. She loved me, and I loved her, loved her to distraction, almost. But we had a quarrel and misunderstanding. She was at fault, but she thought I was. I couldn't blame her at first, but I did when after I explained, she would not believe me. She has found out differently, now.

"In the agony of my heart, I wanted to get away, so I came out here. I am not 'Eddie Smith' as you know me, but I am really Edgar Griegg, son of the president of the syndicate.

"I came here to work and to try to forget. But I could not.

"Yesterday a letter came to me. It was from my Lorrayne. She told me that she found out that she was in the wrong, begged my forgiveness, if forgive I could, and to please come back to her if I could after her cruel treatment of me.

"Would I forgive her? Would I go back? I settled up everything at the plant and I was going away tonight on the five o'clock train, but the thought of going now, saddens me when I think of you. I might have known I was playing with fire, but I didn't think. I didn't think you would fall in love with me, and I thought the seven years' difference in our ages would make me and my actions toward you appeal to you as

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossiblt to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful one schosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

ONCE more Aida is with us with suggestions for a winter window box and her ideas are very practical and worthy of trying. This offers an opportunity for indulging in a personal preference for any flower or combination of flowers and many pleasing ideas will suggest themselves to the flower lover, once an active interest is taken in this particular side of flower culture. Start now and have your own Thanksgiving and Christmas decorations on hand and enjoy them all other days as well.—Ed.

The Window Box for Winter

At this seasop of the year it is well to prepare a window box for the sunny window inside. It can be placed on a small table or stand and the vines that hang over the sides of the box will soon cover the stand and make a beautiful show. For the edge of the box, red, green, and green and white striped Wandering Jew are desirable both for their habit of quick growth and beauty.

For vines to grow up on a trellis, the Thunbergia, in several varieties, and the delicate lavender Maurandia, with its swinging bells, are both lovely, one at each end of the box is sufficient. A slender stick at each end will be sufficient for them to climb on, or if one desires the vines can be allowed to climb the windows, which is a very pretty method of training them. Of course the seeds of these vines must be sown in the box, but they are quick growers.

Slips of any good colors in petunias can be made in the box and start readily. Seed of Sweet Alyssum can be sown and the box will soon be a bower of beauty. In the late fall a few bulbs can be snugly planted, tulips especially, they make such a bright show, or the golden Narcissus that can be depended upon to bloom.

A window box like this is little or no trouble and will afford the entire family much pleasure the whole winter through. AIDA.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I was so pleased to learn that the sisters are planning to give Uncle Charlie a home for his birthday present and enclose herein a money order for one dollar to buy one brick. Also enclosed is one dollar from my mother, Mrs. J. E. Cone and twenty-five cents from my little daughter, Alice.

It is much better I think to give flowers to those we love while they are still with us, for after they have passed away it is only the friends of the loved ones who can appreciate the monuments and memorials we erect to their memory. Uncle Charlie should know how we value his beautiful character, his big heart, his wonderful patience in all his long suffering, his great mind, his sweet charity to all the afflicted ones and what he has done for the boys and girls of America in teaching them preparedness and many other important matters which will develop their characters.

About eight years ago, my mother and I purchased some of his books of poems to give for Christmas presents and I received an autographed card from him which I have pasted in the front of the book of poems and it is one of my most valued possessions.

We should all feel very grateful to COMFORT for giving us such a grand man for an uncle and I hope that it won't be long until this little paper will be in every home in the United States.

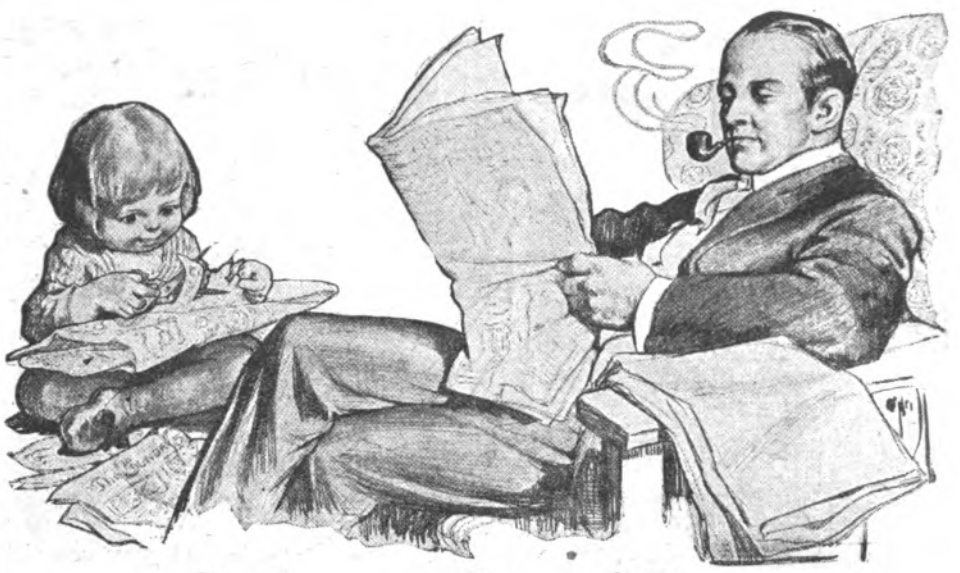
I enjoy reading the letters from the sisters very much. I have brown eyes and hair, am a stenographer, and have a dear little girl of four years who is a constant source of pleasure.

With kind regards to yourself and sisters and trusting that the home for Uncle Charlie will soon be a reality, I am, Very sincerely,

MRS. RENO CONE JACOBS.

CUMBERLAND, WIS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:



You can make a packing chest at very little cost by following these directions:

Get a good dry-goods box and molding enough to go around the corners, the bottom and the cover. Use brass hinges for the cover and a hasp and brass padlock so that the chest can be locked. Tack on the molding with small, headless nails and see that the cover fits snugly so as to make it moth proof, which can be helped by painting the inside with oil of cedar. For decorations it may be stained or painted and ornamented in any selected design with brass headed tacks or it may be nicely sandpapered and ornamented in pyrography. The design may be drawn with a pencil and burned in very neatly, even by an amateur.

May I say a few words through COMFORT about good night to our little ones? Make it a pleasant one, always. Do not send a child to bed with a sob. How it tortures our hearts to remember crying ourselves to sleep. It is one of the saddest things in life, to the adult as well as the child. It is not always possible to avoid a last sad wakeful hour. Bereavement comes to us one and all. The dear one is gone and our hearts ache so when we lie down to sleep. It is not mine to offer impossible consolation to those dear sorrowing hearts. God alone can comfort them. But the preventable annoyances which can so easily be avoided, particularly with our children, is what I have in mind when I say make your good night a pleasant one. If a child studies evenings, try to brush out the cobwebs from a tired brain before he goes to rest. A song, a few minutes of laughter or a story with a joke, a good-night caress and the child will sink to rest with a happy smile. There are corrections and chastisements often administered that are better left for reflection. "Wait till morning to whip me," a dear little lad once said. Leave such things, if you can, till morning and often you will see it in a more tender light.

I am not here to criticize or discuss punishments but, dear parents, try to do it in the morning. The settling of disputes between members of families is poor business for evening entertainment and you, "men," do you discuss economics, haggle over unpaid bills, or argue saving with your tired wife? Do you take this hour to cut off her last chance of rest? Foolish man, better get up an hour early some morn-

Sunday as a Day of Rest.

A magazine writer says that women, and especially women in small towns and on farms, do not get any rest on Sunday. Possibly she is right.

It is quite certain that the men rest on Sunday—and eat—and the women who cook the big Sunday dinners do not get much rest until they learn how to take the "short cuts" that save unnecessary work in hot kitchens. One of the most important of these "short cuts" is the new method of dessert-making. In place of the heavy puddings and pies which have always accompanied the heavy Sunday dinners, fruity desserts are served—desserts that are sparkling and beautiful and delicious beyond comparison.

These Jell-O desserts, which just fit the Sunday appetite, are made by dissolving Jell-O in boiling water. It is done in a minute, and adds a good many minutes to woman's share of Sunday rest.

In every Jell-O package there is a little folder containing rules, suggestions and recipes for making up Jell-O in all possible forms.

Jell-O is made in seven different flavors: Strawberry, Raspberry, Lemon, Orange, Cherry, Peach, Chocolate. Each 10 cents at any grocer's or any general store.

The flavors are pure fruit flavors and the full strength of the flavors is preserved by the air-tight and moisture-proof waxed-paper Safety Bags enclosing the Jell-O inside the cartons.

The price has never changed. It is ten cents to-day just as it has been from the beginning.

The 1916 Jell-O Book is the most beautiful ever issued and it contains more useful information for housewives than any other. Send us your name and address and we will mail you one of the books.

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

LAST Thanksgiving we had for a guest a young woman whose ingenuity and resourcefulness is well known among her friends and to her I turned over the problem of table decorations while I attended to the prosaic, though perhaps more important, task of looking after the turkey and fixin's. This is what she did:

After washing and hollowing out a medium-sized, golden pumpkin and cutting the top in an irregular manner she placed it on one of my best embroidered doilies in the center of the table and filled it with mixed nuts. Then from some source, best known to herself—the toyshop I think—she produced a little toy squirrel which she securely fastened in the middle of the heaping mound of nuts, as though he were contemplating with pleasure the feast before him. The overflow of nuts onto the dolly underneath took away any suggestion of bareness and further carried out the idea of plenty, which is the keynote of Thanksgiving.—Ed.

SOUR MILK GINGER CAKES.—One half cup of sugar, one half cup of molasses, scant tablespoon of ginger, one half teaspoon of soda and one third teaspoon of salt mixed thoroughly together. Beat in one tablespoon of warmed butter and one cup of thick sour milk, and lastly two and one quarter cups of pastry flour to which has been added one more half teaspoon of soda. Half cream and half sour milk make the cakes richer, when the butter is omitted. An attractive dessert is made by arranging cakes on a plate, heaping the top with whipped cream and in the center place a cube of red jelly or preserve.

GINGER SNAPS.—One pint each sorghum and lard, two cups of sugar, one cup cold water, six teaspoons baking-powder, two tablespoons ginger and flour enough to make a stiff dough. Roll out and bake. These are fine.

CHOCOLATE CAKE.—Two cups white sugar, one half cup butter and lard, two eggs, one half cup cocoa, one half cup sour milk, one teaspoon baking soda, two cups flour and last of all, one half cup boiling water. MRS. EDWIN H. KOCH, Wescoesville, Pa.

MADONIA CAKE.—To the well-beaten yolks of four eggs add two cups of sugar, one half cup of butter, three quarters of a cup of sweet milk, two teaspoons baking powder and four cups flour. Beat well and lastly add the whites of the eggs, well beaten, and one teaspoon of any desired flavoring. Bake in loaf or in layers. This is fine.

MRS. CRAYTON WILLIAMS, Westminster, S. C.

VELVET CAKE.—Two cups sugar, four cups flour, one cup butter, one cup cold water, four eggs, one half teaspoon soda, one teaspoon cream of tartar. Beat the butter and sugar to a cream; dissolve the soda in water; mix cream of tartar in flour; beat the eggs separately, then add other ingredients and flavor with one tablespoon lemon or almond. Bake one hour in a moderate oven. This quantity is sufficient for two loaves.

LIZZIE BETH KEENE, West Alton, Mo.

PARIS CAKE.—One and one half cups white sugar, three eggs, butter size of an egg, one cup of milk, two and one half cups flour, two teaspoons baking-powder and one teaspoon vanilla. Bake in layer or loaf.

HAZEL CHRISTINE MAURER, Clive, Alberta, Kans.

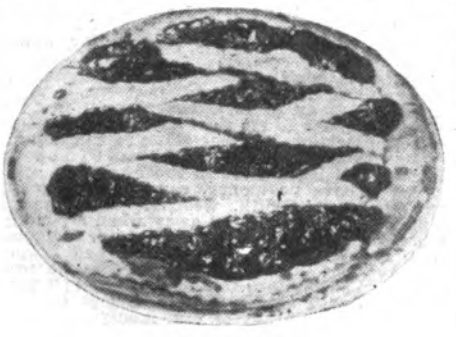
OATMEAL COOKIES.—Three cups of raw oatmeal, one cup of shortening (if lard is used, add a dash of salt), one and one half cups of sugar, one cup sour milk, one teaspoon soda, two eggs, one teaspoon cinnamon, three cups flour, two teaspoons baking powder, and one pint of raisins and nuts chopped and mixed together. Batter will be stiff. Place by the spoonful on buttered tin and bake.

MRS. A. R. SMITH, Afton, Okla.

FRUIT COOKIES.—One and one half cups brown sugar, one cup of butter, two eggs, two tablespoons sweet milk, one teaspoon soda, one teaspoon cinnamon, one quarter teaspoon cloves, one quarter teaspoon nutmeg and one cup chopped raisins, with flour enough to roll.

FRIED CAKES.—One cup sweet milk, one egg, one half cup sugar, one tablespoon of half lard and half butter. two teaspoons baking powder, a pinch of salt; mix soft, roll out, and fry in hot lard.

DEVIL'S FOOD CAKE.—Two cups brown sugar, one half cup of butter, one half cup grated chocolate, one half cup sour milk, one half cup hot water, two eggs, one teaspoon of soda and three cups of flour.



ICING.—One cup of sweet milk and one cup of sugar. Cook until thick enough to spread nicely without running. MRS. IZORA DUGUID, Decatur, Ill.

SOFT JUMBLES.—One egg, well-beaten, one and one half cups sugar, two thirds of a cup of butter, one cup sour milk, one teaspoon soda and three and one half cups flour. Flavor to taste. Bake in gem pans in a slow oven.

HOT WATER GINGERBREAD.—One egg, well-beaten, one cup molasses, one half cup sugar, one half cup lard, one teaspoon soda, pinch of salt and a little of all spices, two cups of flour and then stir in one cup of hot water. Bake in very hot oven.

MRS. BURTON BATCHELDOR, Clinton, Maine.

CRANBERRY PIE.—Put cranberries in agate stewing pan and cover with boiling water to within one inch of top. Stew till cranberries break open, stirring frequently as they will quickly catch on bottom. Put through coarse strainer to remove skins. A thick pulp should be left. Peel, core and slice a third as much apple and line fairly deep pie plates with pie crust, fill two thirds full of cranberry pulp and cover with one third sliced apple. Add one cup of sugar, butter size of a walnut, and a pinch of salt. Cover with crossed strips of pie crust two inches wide and bake three quarters of an hour in a slow oven, except for the first ten minutes when the oven should be hot.

PIE CRUST.—To three cups of sifted flour, work in half a cup of equal parts of lard and butter and a teaspoon of salt. Rub together till of a granula consistency. Add ice-cold water, a very little at a time till the dough will just stick together. Handle as little as possible and roll thin.

TO CRYSTALLIZE FRUIT.—Pick out the finest of any kind of fruit, leave in the stones; beat the whites of three eggs to a stiff froth; lay the fruit in the beaten egg, with the stem upward; drain them and beat the part that drops off again; select them out, one by one, and dip them into a cup of finely-powdered sugar; cover a pan with a sheet of fine paper, place the fruit on it, and set it in a cool oven; when the icing on the fruit becomes firm, pile them on a dish, and set them in a cool place.

COTTAGE PUDDING.—Three cups of flour, or sufficient to make the batter; one tablespoon butter, one cup sugar, two eggs, one cup milk, half a teaspoon soda, one teaspoon each of cream of tartar and salt; mix the cream of tartar and salt with the flour; beat the whites of the eggs, put the butter, sugar, and yolks of the eggs together. Then work in the milk, soda, and salt, adding the flour and whites of the eggs; there should be flour enough to make a fairly stiff batter; butter a mold or dish, and bake; it may be turned out or served from the dish; to be eaten with any liquid sauce.

MEAT ROLLS WITH RICE CAKES.—Two cups of chopped cooked meat that has a little fat with it, one tablespoon of finely minced onion, teaspoon of salt, saltspoon of black pepper, one beaten egg, one half cup of milk and one even tablespoon of flour. Put two teaspoons of butter into a frying pan with the pepper, onion, salt, and when the butter is bubbling add the flour and stir till smooth. Add the milk and when it boils stir in the chopped meat and cook three minutes. When about half cool, stir in the beaten egg and shape into rolls. Roll in either meal or flour and fry in quite deep fat, or they may be baked in a very hot oven. An excellent way to use left overs.

CREAMED MEAT.—Melt a heaping tablespoon of butter in frying pan, add a heaping tablespoon of flour and stir until thick, then add one cup of meat gravy and one cup rich milk; stir until smooth and creamy. When creamy, add two cups cold meat, finely shredded, and seasoned with salt and pepper, and cook until hot. Serve on toast or with baked potatoes. This is delicious and uses up the leftovers.

MRS. HELEN JOHNSON, Humbird, Wis.

A GOOD STEAK.—Wash steak, flour well, season and fry in usual way. When brown, take three mangoes, one onion and one lemon, slice and put between cuts and on top. Fill skillet with water, let it boil down and if necessary fill a second time. Pour catsup over before serving. MRS. H. E. JOHNSON, St. Joseph, Mo.

MEAT PIE.—Chop cold meat, about a quart for two pies. To this add one onion, chopped fine, salt and pepper to taste, a little water and dot with butter. Bake in two crusts.

THELMA JUANITA ESTES, McArthur, Cal.

HAM TIMBALES.—Dissolve one tablespoon of granulated gelatine in one half cup of hot water and add two cups of cold boiled ham, chopped very fine. Season with one teaspoon of made mustard and a dash of red pepper; then add one half cup of cream, beaten until stiff. Turn into a mould or moulds and chill thoroughly. Remove from mould, garnish with parsley and serve with a sauce made as follows:

SAUCE.—Beat one half cup heavy cream until stiff and add three tablespoons mayonnaise dressing, one tablespoon of grated horseradish, one teaspoon of mustard, one half teaspoon of salt and a few grains of red pepper.

MRS. CHESTER I. SIMMERS, Hildebrand, Oregon.

A GOOD BREAKFAST DISH.—To a pint of cold mashed potato add a tablespoon of melted butter, one well-beaten egg, and one teaspoon minced parsley. Mould into cakes with the hands, dip them in beaten egg and then in cracker crumbs and fry to a deep brown in plenty of hot butter and drippings. Have ready as many poached eggs as potato cakes and lay one on the top of each cake. Garnish with parsley and serve while hot.

BAKED CABBAGE.—Boil a firm head of cabbage for fifteen minutes and then change the water, adding fresh boiling water. Let boil until tender, drain and set aside to cool. Mince some boiled ham, mix with bread crumbs, add two eggs, well beaten, one tablespoon of butter, three tablespoons of milk and season with salt and pepper. Chop the cabbage very fine, mix all together and bake till brown. Serve hot.

MRS. E. V. DAVIS, Duluth, Minn.

NUT AND CHEESE ROAST.—Cook two tablespoons of chopped onion in one tablespoon of butter (and a little water) until it is tender. Mix one cup of chopped English walnut meats, one cup of bread crumbs, one cup of cheese, melted, salt, pepper and the juice of half a lemon. Moisten with the water in which the onion has been cooked, pour into a baking dish and brown in in the oven.

HOT SLAW.—With a sharp knife cut up nicely a firm head of cabbage; sprinkle it with as much pepper and salt as you think necessary; beat up the yolk of one egg, add a lump of butter the size of a walnut, a gill of cream, the same quantity of vinegar, a tablespoon of sugar, an even teaspoon of mustard, and a pinch of bruised celery seed; mix together, in a tin cup; put the slaw in an oven, and pour the mixture over it boiling hot; stir it till well mixed, and the cabbage slightly coddled, then send to the table hot.

KOHL-RABI, OR TURNIP CABBAGE.—This vegetable is a variety of the cabbage but instead of the reserve nutritive matter of the plant being stored largely in the leaves or flowers, it is collected in the stem, which forms a turnip-like enlargement just above the ground. Kohl-rabi is fine-flavored and delicate, if cooked when very young and tender. It should be used when it has a diameter of not more than two or three inches. As it grows large it becomes tough and fibrous.

BOILED KOHL-RABI. (Requested.)—Wash and pare the vegetables, then cut in thin slices. Put into slightly salted boiling water and boil, with the cover partially off the stew-pan, until the vegetable is tender. This will take from thirty to fifty minutes. Pour off the water, and season with butter, salt and pepper. Kohl-rabi may be boiled with pork in the same way as cabbage. The cold boiled vegetable may be served as a salad.—(U. S. Dept. of Ag. Recipes.)

AUGUSTA W. JOOST, Edgewood, Md.

PARSNIP FRITTERS.—Four parsnips, boiled and mashed fine; add three well-beaten eggs, two tablespoons of sifted flour, butter the size of an egg, one cup of milk, and salt to taste. Serve quite hot.

WELSH RABBIT.—Melt one teaspoon of butter, add one teaspoon each of salt, mustard and paprika; add two cups of American cheese. When melted, add one half cup of cream. Stir vigorously until smooth; pour over hot buttered crackers or bread toasted on one side, the rabbit being poured over the untoasted side.

VENETIAN CHEESE.—Two small onions browned in butter, melt one half pound of cheese with the onions; when melted, add one small can of tomato soup. Let the mixture heat thoroughly and add two eggs. When the whites of the eggs have set, stir together and serve hot on crackers.

VEAL BALLS.—Two and one half cups of chopped raw veal, three quarters of a cup of raw salt pork, one cup of fine cracker crumbs, one half cup of water, one and one half even tablespoon of flour, one rounding teaspoon of salt, three teaspoons of vinegar, a pinch of white pepper and one beaten egg. Mix all together and shape into balls. Roll in hot pork fat and bake one hour. Cut hearts of celery into quarters pressing a piece into the top of each, and the white tender leaves into the sides.

CHAPTER I.

TWO UNEXPECTED VISITORS.

IT was a cold, raw night in December, and the streets of New York city, despite their myriads of electric lights and gayly illuminated shop windows, were dismal and forlorn beyond description.

The sky was leaden. A piercing wind was blowing up from the East River, and great flakes of snow were beginning to fall, when, out of the darkness of a side street, there came the slight, graceful figure of a young girl, who, crossing Broadway, glided into the glare of the great arclight that was stationed directly opposite a pawnbroker's shop.

She halted a moment just outside the door, one slender, shabbily gloved hand resting irresolutely upon its polished knob, while an expression of mingled pain and disgust swept over her pale but singularly beautiful face.

Presently, however, she straightened herself, and throwing up her head with an air of resolution, she turned the knob, pushed open the door, and entered the shop.

It was a large establishment of its kind, and upon every hand there were indications that that relentless master, Poverty, had been very busy about his work in the homes of the unfortunate, compelling his victims to sacrifice their dearest possessions to his avaricious grasp.

The young girl walked swiftly to the counter, behind which there stood a shrewd-faced Israelite, who was the only occupant of the place, and whose keen black eyes glittered with mingled admiration and cupidity as they fastened themselves upon the lovely face before him.

With an air of quiet dignity the girl lifted her glance to his, as she produced a ticket from the well-worn purse which she carried in her hand.

"I have come, sir, to redeem the watch upon which you loaned me three dollars last week," she remarked, as she laid the ticket upon the counter before him.

"Aha! an' so, miss, you vishes to redeem de vatch!" remarked the man, as he took up the ticket.

"Yes, sir."

"An' vat vill you redeem 'im mit?" he pursued.

"With the same amount that you advanced me, of course," gravely responded the girl.

"Ah! ve vill zee—ve vill zee! Vhere ish de money?" and the man extended a huge soiled hand to her.

"I have a five-dollar gold-piece here," she returned, as she took it from her purse and deposited it also upon the counter; for she shrank from coming in contact with that repulsive unwashed hand.

The pawnbroker seized the coin greedily, his eyes gleaming hungrily at the sight of the yellow gold, while he examined it carefully to assure himself that it was genuine.

"So! so! you vill vant de vatch," he at length observed, in a sullen tone, as if he did not relish the idea of requiring the valuable timespiece upon which he had advanced the paltry sum of three dollars. "Vell!" and irritably pulling out a drawer as he spoke, he dropped the coin into it. "Ah!" he cried, with a sudden start and an angry frown, as it dropped with a ringing sound upon the wood, "vat you mean? You vould sheat me!—you vould rob me! De money ish not goot—de coin ish counterfeit! I vill send for de officer—you shall pe arrested—you von little meek-faced robber! Ah!" he concluded, in a shrill tone of well-simulated anger, as he shook his fist menacingly before his companion.

"I do not understand you!—what do you mean, sir?"

"You play de innocence very vell!" he sneered; then added, gruffly: "You vill not get der vatch, for you haf prought me bad money."

"You are mistaken, sir; I have just received that gold-piece from a respectable lawyer, for whom I have been working during the week, and I know he would not take advantage of me by paying me with counterfeit money," the young girl explained.

"Ah! maybe not—maybe not, miss; not if he knew it," said the pawnbroker, now adopting a wheedling and pitiful tone as he drew forth the shining piece and pushed it toward her. "Somebody may haf sheeted him; but it haf not der true ring of gold, and you'll haf to bring me der t'ree dollars some oder time, miss."

The girl's delicate face flushed, and tears sprang to her eyes. She stood looking sadly down upon the money for a moment, then, with a weary sigh, replaced it in her purse, together with the ticket, and left the shop without a word; while the tricky pawnbroker looked after her, a smile of cunning triumph wreathing his coarse lips.

"Oh, mamma! poor mamma! what shall I do?" murmured the girl, with a heart-broken sob, as she stepped forth upon the street again. "I was so happy to think I had earned enough to redeem your precious watch, and also get something nice and nourishing for your Sunday dinner; but now—what can I do? Oh, it is dreadful to be so poor!"

Another sob choked her utterance, and the glistening tears rolled thick and fast over her cheeks; but she hurried on her way, and, after a brisk walk of ten or fifteen minutes, turned into a side street and presently entered a dilapidated looking house.

Mounting a flight of rickety stairs, she entered a room where a dim light revealed a pale and wasted woman lying upon a poor but spotlessly clean couch.

"Edith, dear, I am so glad you have come," said a faint but sweet voice from the bed.

"And, mamma, I never came home with a sadder heart," sighed the weary and almost discouraged girl, as she sank upon a low chair at her mother's side.

"How so, dear?" questioned the invalid; whereupon her daughter gave an account of her recent interview with the pawnbroker.

"I know Mr. Bryant would never have given me the gold-piece if he had not supposed it to be all right, for he has been so very kind and considerate to me all the week," she remarked, in conclusion, with a slight blush. "I am sure he would exchange it, even now; but he left the office at four, and I do not know where he lives; so I suppose I shall have to wait until Monday; but I am terribly disappointed about the watch, while we have neither food nor fuel to get over Sunday with."

The sick woman sighed gently.

"Perhaps the money is not counterfeit, after all," she remarked, after a moment of thoug t. Perhaps the pawnbroker did not want to give up the watch, and so took that way to get rid of you."

"That is so! how strange that I did not think of it myself!" exclaimed Edith, starting eagerly to her feet. "I will go around to the grocery at once, and perhaps they will take the coin. What a comforter you always prove to be in times of trouble, mamma!" she added, bending down to kiss the pale face upon the pillow. "Cheer up; we will soon have a fire and something to eat."

She again put on her jacket and hat, and drew on her gloves, preparatory to going forth to breast the storm and biting cold once more.

Half an hour later she returned with her arms full of packages, and followed by a man bearing a generous basketful of coal and kindlings.

Her face was glowing, her eyes sparkling, and she was a bewildering vision of beauty and happiness.

"The money wasn't bad, after all, mamma," she said, when the man had departed; "they didn't make the slightest objection to taking it at the grocery. I believe you were right, and that the pawnbroker did not want to give up the watch, so took that way to get rid of me. But I will have it next week, and I shall have a policeman to go with me to get it."

"Did you tell the grocer anything about the trouble you have had?" the invalid inquired.

"No, mamma; I simply offered the coin in payment for what I bought, and he took it without a word," Edith replied, but flushing slightly, for she felt a trifle guilty about passing the money after what had occurred.

"I almost wish you had," said her mother.

"I thought I would, at first, but—I knew we must have something to eat, and fuel to keep us warm between now and Monday, and so I allowed the grocer to take it upon his own responsibility," the young girl responded.

Edith, removing her things, bustled about, and soon had a cheerful fire and an appetizing meal prepared.

"Now come, mamma," Edith remarked, at length; "let me help you into your chair and wheel you up to the table, for supper is ready, and I am sure you will enjoy these delicious oysters, which I have cooked as you like them best."

Mother and daughter were chatting pleasantly, enjoying their meal, when the door of their room was thrown rudely open and two men strode into their presence.

Edith started to her feet in mingled indignation and alarm, then grew deadly pale when she observed that one of the intruders was an officer, and the other the grocer of whom she had made her recent purchases.

"What is the meaning of this intrusion?" she asked.

"There! Mr. Officer; that is the girl who passed the counterfeit money at my store," the grocer exclaimed, his face crimson with anger.

Edith uttered a smothered cry of anguish, then sank weakly back into her chair, as the man went forward to her side, laid his hand upon her shoulder, and remarked:

"You are my prisoner, miss."

CHAPTER II.

A STANCH FRIEND MAKES A VAIN APPEAL.

Beautiful Edith Allandale and her gentle, refined mother had been suddenly hurled from affluence down into the very depths of poverty.

Only two years previous to the opening of our story the world had been as bright to them as to any of the petted favorities of fortune who dwell in the luxurious palaces on Fifth Avenue.

Albert Allandale had been a wealthy broker in Wall street; for years fortune had showered her favors upon him, and everything he had touched seemed literally to turn to gold in his grasp.

His family consisted of his wife, his beautiful daughter, and two bright sons, ten and twelve years of age, upon whom the dearest hopes of his life had centered.

But like a thunderbolt out of a clear sky, an illness of less than a week had deprived him of both of his sons.

Diphtheria, that fell destroyer, laid its relentless hand upon them, and they had died upon the same day, within a few hours of each other.

The heart-broken father was a changed man from the moment, when, sitting in speechless agony beside these idolized boys, he watched their young lives go out, and felt that the future held nothing to tempt him to live on.

His mind appeared to be impaired by this crushing blow; he could neither eat nor sleep; his business was neglected, and, day by day, he failed, until in less than six months from the time that death had so robbed him, he had followed his boys, leaving his wife and lovely daughter to struggle as best they could with poverty; for their great wealth had melted like snow beneath the blazing sun when Mr. Allandale lost his interest in the affairs of the world.

Keenly sensitive, and no less proud—crushed by their many sorrows, the bereaved wife and daughter hid themselves and their grief from every one, in a remote corner of the great city. But misfortune followed misfortune—Mrs. Allandale having become a confirmed invalid—until they were reduced to the straits described at the opening of our story.

The week preceding they had spent their last dollar—obtained by pawning one after another of their old-time treasures—and Edith insisted upon seeking employment.

She had seen an advertisement for a copyist in one of the daily papers, and, upon answering it in person, succeeded in obtaining the situation with the young lawyer already mentioned.

Every day spent in her presence only served to make him admire her the more; and, before the week was out, he had altogether lost his heart to her.

When Saturday evening arrived, he paid her with the golden coin which was destined to bring fresh sorrow upon her, and she went out from his presence with a strange feeling of pride and independence over the knowledge that she had earned it with her own hands, and henceforth would be able to provide for her own and her mother's comfort.

But Royal Bryant had been conscience-smitten when he saw her beautiful face light up with mingled pride and pleasure as he laid that tiny piece of gold in her palm.

He would gladly have doubled the amount; but five dollars had been the sum agreed upon for that first week's work, and he feared that he would wound her pride by offering her a gratuity.

So he had told her that she would be worth more to him the next week, and that he would continue to increase her wages in proportion as she acquired speed and proficiency in her work.

Thus she had started forth, that dreary Saturday night with a comparatively light heart, to redeem her watch, before going home to tell her mother her good news.

But, alas! how disastrously the day had closed!

"Come, miss," impatiently remarked the officer, as she sat with bowed head, her face covered with her hands, "get on your things! I've no time to be fooling away, and must run you into camp before it gets any later."

"Oh, what do you mean?" cried Edith, starting wildly to her feet. "Where are you going to take me?"

"To the station-house, of course, where you'll stay until Monday, when you'll be taken to court for your examination," was the gruff reply.

"Oh, no! I can never spend two nights in such a place!" moaned the nearly frantic girl. "I have done no intentional wrong," she continued, lifting an appealing look to the man's face. "That money was given to me for some work that I have been doing this week, and if any one is answerable for it being counterfeit, it should be the person who paid it to me."

"Who paid you the money?" the officer demanded.

"A lawyer for whom I have been copying—Mr. Royal Bryant; his office is at No. —— Broadway."

"Then you'll have to appeal to him. But of course it's too late now to find him at his office. Where does he live?"

"I do not know," sighed Edith, dejectedly. "I have only been with him one week, and did not once hear him mention his residence."

"That's a pity, miss," returned the officer, in a gentler tone, for he began to be moved by her beauty and distress. The condition of the invalid, who had fallen back weak and faint in her chair when he entered, also appealed to him.

"Unless you can prove your story true, and make up the grocer's loss to him, I shall be obliged to lock you up to await your examination."

"Do you mean that if I could pay Mr. Pincher I need not be arrested?" she eagerly inquired.

"Yes; the man only wants his money."

"Then he shall have it," Edith joyfully exclaimed. "I will give him back the change he gave me, then I will go to Mr. Bryant the first thing Monday morning and tell him about the gold-piece, when I am sure he will make it all right, and I can pay Mr. Pincher for what I bought tonight."

"No, you don't, miss," here interposed the grocer himself. "I've had that game played on me too many times already. You'll just fork over five dollars to me this very night or off you go to the lock-up. I'm not going to run any risk of your skipping out of sight between now and Monday, and leaving me in the lurch."

"But I have no money, save the change you gave me," said Edith, wearily. "And do you think I would wish to run away when my mother is too sick to be moved?" she added, indignantly. "I could not take her with me, and I would not leave her. Oh, pray do not force me to go to that dreadful place this fearful night! I promise that I will stay quietly here and that you shall have every penny of your money on Monday morning."

"She certainly will keep her word, gentlemen," Mrs. Allendale here interposed, in a tremulous voice. "Do not force her to leave me, for I am very ill and need her."

"I'm going to have my five dollars now, or to jail she will go," was the gruff response of the obdurate grocer.

"Oh, I cannot go to jail!" wailed the persecuted girl.

Mrs. Allandale, almost unnerved by the sight of her grief, pleaded again with pallid face and quivering lips for her. But the man was relentless.

"Do your duty, Mr. Officer, and I'll be on hand Monday morning, in court, to tell 'em how I've been swindled."

With this he vanished, leaving the policeman no alternative but to enforce the law.

"Oh, mamma! mamma! how can I live and suffer such shame?" cried the despairing girl, as she sank upon her knees in front of the sick woman, and shuddered from head to foot in view of the fate before her.

Mrs. Allandale was so overcome that she could not utter one word of comfort. She was only able to lift one wasted hand and lay it upon the golden head with a touch of infinite tenderness: then, with a gasp, she fainted dead away.

"Oh, you have killed her!" Edith cried, in an agonized tone. "What shall I do? How can I leave her? I will not. Oh! will no one come to help me in this dreadful emergency?"

"Sure, Miss Allandale, ye know that Kate O'Brien is always willin' to lend ye a hand when you're in trouble—bless yer bonny heart!" here interposed a loud but kindly voice, and the next instant the good-natured face of a buxom Irishwoman was thrust inside the door, which the grocer had left ajar when he went out. "What is the matter here?" she concluded, glancing from the officer to the senseless woman in her chair, and over whom Edith was hanging, chafing her cold hands, while bitter tears rolled over her face.

A few words sufficed to explain the situation, and then the indignation of the warm-hearted daughter of Erin blazed forth more forcibly than elegantly, and she berated the absent grocer and present officer in no gentle terms.

Kate O'Brien would gladly have advanced the five dollars to the grocer, but, unfortunately, she herself was at that moment almost destitute of cash.

"Come, Miss Allandale," said the officer, somewhat impatiently, "I can't wait any longer."

"Oh, mamma! how can I leave you like this?" moaned the girl.

"She has only fainted, mavourneen," said Kate O'Brien, in a tender tone. "She'll soon come to herself, and ye may safely trust her wid me—I'll not lave her til ye come back again."

And with this assurance, Edith was forced to be content, for she saw, by the officer's resolute face, that she could hope for no reprieve.

So, with one last agonizing look, she pressed a kiss upon the pallid brow of her loved one; then, again donning her hat and shawl, she told the policeman that she was ready, and went forth once more into the darkness and the pitiless storm.

CHAPTER III.

THE YOUNG LAWYER EXPERIENCES TWO EXTRAORDINARY SURPRISES.

The next morning, in the matron's room of the Thirtieth street station-house, a visitor came to see Edith Allandale. The visitor was Kate O'Brien, who, after announcing the condition of the prisoner's mother, declared her willingness to aid Edith in any way in her power.

Edith intrusted a letter to her for Mr. Royal Bryant, and early Monday morning Kate was at the lawyer's office, and placed the missive in his hands.

The young man instantly recognized the handwriting of his fair copyist, and flushed to his brow at sight of it.

"Ah! she is ill and has sent me word that she cannot come to the office today!" he said to himself.

"Sit down, madam," he said to his visitor, and he eagerly tore open the letter and read the following:

"MR. BRYANT—Dear Sir: I am sorry to have to tell you that the five-dollar gold-piece which you gave me on Saturday evening was a counterfeit coin. I passed it at a grocery, near which I reside, in payment for necessaries which I purchased, and, half an hour later, was arrested for the crime of passing spurious money. I could not appeal to you at the time, for I did not know your address; but now I beg that you will come to my aid tomorrow morning, when I shall have to appear in court to answer the charge, for I do not know of any one else upon whom to call in my present extremity. Oh, pray come at once, for my mother is very ill and needs me.

"Respectfully yours, EDITH M. ALLANDALE."

Royal Bryant's face was ghastly white when he finished reading this brief epistle.

"Good heavens!" he muttered, "to think of that beautiful girl being arrested and imprisoned for such an offense! Where is Miss Allandale?" he added, aloud, turning to Mrs. O'Brien, who had been watching him with a jealous eye ever since entering the room.

"In the Thirtieth street station-house, sir," she briefly responded.

"Infamous!" exclaimed the young man, in great excitement. "And has she been in that vile place since Saturday evening?"

"She has, sir; but not with the common lot; the matron has been very good to her, sir, and gave her a bed in her own room," the woman explained.

"Blessed be the matron!" was Royal Bryant's inward comment. Then, turning again to his companion, he inquired:

"What is your name, if you please, madam?"

"Kate O'Brien, at yer service, sir."

"Thank you; and do you live near Miss Allandale?"

How to Buy Coffee

By the Greatest Coffee Merchants in the World

Three Mistakes Many Women Make

You know how hard it is to get a coffee which really satisfies you. You know how seldom you can find a coffee which has the same fine taste and strength every morning! It can be done.

You can do it if, when you buy coffee, you are careful not to make the mistakes so many women make. Read the experiences below—you yourself have undoubtedly had one or more of them.

Beware of loose coffee

Are you buying coffee which you get loose, coffee which hasn't been protected by a sealed package?

Are you afraid that it isn't clean? Has it lost its aroma? Are you often disappointed in its strength?

It isn't the grocer's fault. With loose coffee, he can't be sure that it is the same kind he got before. You always run the risk of getting different coffee every time you buy. And even if the coffee itself were the same, it can't be kept "loose" without losing its strength and flavor.

Protected in sealed packages bearing our name and guarantee

You can do away with everyone of these disappointments by ordering the coffee which over one million other families drink!

Arbuckles' Coffee is such good coffee that way back in the sixties, when all other coffees on the market were loose and unprotected, Arbuckle Brothers protected theirs in sealed packages. This sealed package keeps the coffee's strength, guards it from moisture and store odors. Most important of all, it makes it easy for you to be sure that you are getting the same good coffee every time you buy.

So strong, so fresh, so full of flavor, is Arbuckles' Coffee, package after package, that there is more of it sold today than of any other packaged coffee.

Don't think you can get as good value buying this way

Are you buying coffee from a peddler who comes to your house with a wagon?

You pay for this man and wagon coming to your door.

Often you pay as much as 10 cents a pound more than you would if you bought the same coffee in the ordinary way from your grocer. You pay as high as 30 cents for a 20 cent coffee.

It is right that your coffee should bring you useful, beautiful premiums, but you should get your full money's worth in the coffee itself first of all.

Arbuckles' Coffee is a "known coffee" —no doubt about you getting your money's worth in it. Arbuckle Brothers are the biggest coffee people in the world, and can give you values no one else can afford to give. Then because of the enormous sale of their coffee, Arbuckles' can afford to share their profits with you by giving you premiums.

Arbuckle premiums are famous. In one year, Arbuckle gave away over a million of one kind of premium!

Over a million families are saving for Arbuckle premiums now. Get one and see for yourself what remarkable values they are.

The same old coffee under new names

Are you continually being offered the same old coffees under new names? Under all sorts of new blends?

Did you ever stop to think of the hundreds of coffees which come and go on the market? And that all of these have tried to turn women away from Arbuckles' coffee?

Arbuckles' is the coffee which has gone right out, always under its own name, never disguised, and held its users simply on the wonderful value it gave. You know what good value a coffee must be to do this against the competition of all the other coffees in America!

Used in over a million homes today

Settle, for all time, your coffee problem by giving your family the only coffee which over a million families have proved to have the real coffee taste they want.

When you get Arbuckles' Coffee, you get an entirely different coffee. No other coffee goes through the same process—in no other coffee can you get the same good flavor. The result of the care Arbuckle Brothers take in selecting it, in roasting and in packaging it, gives you an entirely different coffee from any on the market.

Order it from your grocer today. He has it, in either the Whole Bean or the new Ground.

Try it—see why it is the most popular coffee in America!

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE FORLORN HOPE.

JOCELYN DE BURGH, while her unknown uncle was searching the country for her, awoke suddenly from a dream. So suddenly that for a moment there seemed to linger on her hand the touch of Willie Huntley's fingers, that had been so tender, in her dream.

But not for long. She stared about her, realizing that she was really in the tower chamber at Castle De Burgh; and then she shuddered. She was in Hugo's clutches, and she was cold, cold to the bone.

"I didn't mean to go to sleep," she thought, as she tried to warm her frozen fingers, her icy feet, "but I'm glad I did! It has passed the time."

She stared at the window that was in a deep embrasure, and not more than six inches wide where the glass was set.

"It's broad day, and it's sunny outside. I wish I knew what time it is."

She went close to the narrow window-pane and tried to see out, brushing away the dirt and cobwebs with her dress. But she could not see down at all, only by the run of the mountains opposite she could tell what side of the castle she was on. She was looking, she knew, toward Glen Farm; that meant she was somewhere above the garden where the side door was.

"I wonder if I broke the glass and screamed if anyone could hear me," she said to herself, knowing all the time that no one could.

She felt faint with hunger. Was Hugo never coming? Did he mean to let her die there?

"Nonsense!" she said bravely. "Someone will miss me; they must have missed me before this."

For the diabolical thoroughness with which Hugo had disposed of her never entered her mind; nor that he had himself thrown all her poor belongings into her one box and locked it with a key that happened to fit it, so that the household would think she had packed her trunk in readiness to follow her.

She turned sharply to the door. Was there a noise outside? Was it, could it be Moyra? She had almost sprung joyfully to the threshold as the bolt was drawn back outside; something stopped her just in time, for it was not Moyra who opened the door. Hugo, his eternal cigarette in his mouth, stood in the doorway, smiling.

"Good morning! Have you had enough of your retreat?" he asked, as coolly as if the cold of the stone room had not met him like a wall of ice as he entered.

Jocelyn clasped her hands hard behind her back so that he might not see how they shook.

"Quite enough," she answered boldly. "Why do you ask? You know it."

"I want to know a little more before you leave it!" He closed the door behind him without a sound that might echo down the stone stairways. "I want to know where your father is—and how you happened to find him?"

"How do you know I found him?"

"Don't be a fool," roughly. "I know well enough. I know you were in London when he was." He had wormed the fact of Jocelyn's absence out of the maid who waited on her. "Tell me where he is now, and I will give you a hundred pounds—not to speak of breakfast"—evilly—"and take you to your friend, Miss Barry."

"She is no friend of mine. She turned me out," the girl said wearily.

"For your good," Hugo remarked, with a glance of annoyance at her. "You have only your own self-will to blame for this, I may remind you."

She did not answer. Her eyes were on the door, measuring the distance. Could she pass him and run down those stairs?

Even as she thought, he shifted his position till he leaned against the shut door.

"How dare you keep me here?" she flashed out angrily. "Move, and let me go down. Do you think I have not been missed—long ago?"

Mr. De Burgh laughed.

"You are in London. You went last night!" he rejoined comfortably. "I shall send your box as soon as I get your address, which will be tomorrow night!"

"Are you mad?" she stared aghast. "Or are you only the cruel, unscrupulous man that Martha warned me of?"

"Martha!" For an instant he wondered, but he cast the thought aside contemptuously. The Martha, of whom he had thought instinctively, could have no connection with this girl. It was that cursed letter from young Meredith this morning that had set his thoughts on the old tragedy.

"I suppose you mean the old woman at Miss Barry's?" contemptuously. "Her mistress had, probably, told her I am a devil incarnate. But you shall find me fair enough, if you do as I tell you."

"What would you do if I told you where my father is?" the girl said slowly. "You would put him back into that asylum."

"I would give him a thousand pounds and start him and you to America."

But it was not well said, and she knew it for a lie.

"I don't believe you!" she turned away with a lump in her throat.

"Don't you? It doesn't matter. You shall listen to me, all the same." He was very pale, his eyes were merciless as she was startled into looking at him by something in his cold, arrogant voice. "Do you think," he went on, "that you, shut up here, can make terms with me? I will do what I please with your father and with you. But till you tell me where he is, here you stay. Without food or fire you will, perhaps, think better of your obstinacy. In any case, you can't save the man. He is a lunatic—a man under a sentence; you cannot turn aside the law. I will give you till tomorrow morning. I will come then. But I warn you it will be the last time. You can stay here until you die after that. My mother would say I was a fool to give you any alternative."

"Because your mother knows my existence is a continual menace to you," she broke in, with reckless bravery. "I tell you that I would rather die here than betray my father—or owe my release to you!" with a look and gesture of abhorrence.

The next moment she thought he would strike her, but his lifted hand fell to his side.

"As you like," he said, with a deadly, slow malice. "Choose to die here—and not a soul will ever hear you in your agony. I believe, after all, it would be as good a way to be rid of you as any other."

"Quite as good, if you could do it." She came slowly toward him, her steady, gleaming eyes on his. "But you will never do it. I tell you that death is nearer to you this minute than to me."

A silence fell, while he tried to find a sneering answer, and through it there came very faint and far off a simple cry as of a hunting beast. Something strange and savage in it turned the man's blood cold.

"There is death in it!" Jocelyn said quietly, driven by some impulse whose source she did not know. "And it will come nearer."

"Stop this cursed rot about death!" he said angrily. "You won't want to talk about it in a day or two, and you can hold your tongue now till the morning. After that you can say what you please; only the stone walls will hear you."

He was outside the door almost as he spoke, and she heard the bolt go home. He meant it, then! She had no thought he could dare to be in earnest.

For all her bravery, she felt sick and faint, she staggered somehow to the window, and put her forehead against the pane. But it was warm with the sun, and she started. If the sun were on this side of the house, or had been, for it was going fast, it must be late in the afternoon. No wonder she felt so faint for want of food! And it would not be long till the morning, when she must make her choice between her own liberty and her father's.

"Oh, if I can only hold out," she bit her lips not to say it aloud, for if Hugo were listening outside the door, he should never know he had wrung a cry from her. "But I must hold out; I must! For I don't believe he would let me go if I told him twenty times," the truth suddenly dashing on her. "Why, of course he wouldn't; he daren't! I am the only one with any right to Castle De Burgh, and he knows it. No wonder he wanted to get 'his finger on me.' If I could prove my mother's marriage I could turn him out tomorrow; and my father—Martha—could both tell me what I want to know."

A fresh strength had come to her with the quickening of her pulses; the look that had been on her face when she told Hugo de Burgh that there was death in that far-off cry came back intensified. She looked round searchingly, almost hopefully. Surely if she had only courage enough, there must be a way of escape!

The door she would not try. Hugo might still be there; he should not hear her vainly shaking at it like a caged animal. The walls were solid enough to have been made of a single stone. The girl sat down on the floor and took off the sensibly thick shoe that Miss Barry had provided for house wear. It had a solid leather heel and was strong enough for what she wanted. She walked to the window, never feeling the cold floor through the stocking on her shoeless foot, and bound up her eyes with her handkerchief.

With her left arm held high to shield her face from flying splinters, she beat the glass out, using her shoe as a hammer. It flew outside, most of it, but the window was too high from the ground to hear its fall. The sweet air rushed in like a benediction, like a promise of liberty; but Jocelyn hammered steadily on till there was a space free of splintered glass, and she dared press her face close to it. The window was too narrow to put her head out of—she knew that even while she tore off the handkerchief that had kept the flying glass from her eyes—but she could see far better than before.

She pressed her face feverishly to the aperture. She had been right—the window overlooked the garden, the very place where she had stood in the wind and rain with Huntley, and felt that kiss which no woman forgets till her dying day—the kiss of the only man she loves, or ever will love in this world.

"Huntley!" It was like an inspiration. Surely, if he loved her, he would save her. Yet how could she let him know to what a pass she had come?

"Things are so bad with me I can't make them any worse. I daren't trust Hugo, even if I were to tell him what I never shall," she thought swiftly. "Hugo never walks in that garden; Moyra does, so does Gilbert. Either of them would find Huntley. Thank Heaven, I know something that would bring him to me!" She stifled the other thought that rose, with its doubt that her message could ever reach him.

On the floor lay Jane Brown's envelope, that had held the warning letter Hugo had stolen. Jocelyn picked it up, and, with a little knife and pencil that she always kept in her pocket, she cut the envelope along the ends so that it opened like a sheet of paper, and on the blank inside thus disclosed she wrote something; wrote quickly, for the afternoon sun was low in the west; soon it would be too late for anyone to walk in that garden—to any purpose.

She pulled the hairpins from her hair, and with determined fingers sawed off a thick, strong lock with her little knife. That must do for a cord, for she had nothing else. "Lord Huntley of Holycross; very urgent," she wrote, making as thick, black marks as the toy pencil would let her.

Very quietly she undid the fine chain round her neck and slipped off his ring. "Forever" was cut on the seal, and, alone in the house of her enemies, Jocelyn de Burgh kissed it with steady lips, as one who bids good by to a friend. Then she folded the paper round it, with the lock of chestnut hair that went through the ring, making it fast to the paper.

"Send my ring, and I will know you want me," Huntley had said. Well, she wanted him now; if it did not reach him she would soon be past the need of him or any other!

When the little packet was done she went to the window and threw it out with a hand that never wavered. It might fall straight into Hugo's hands; it might never be found, or be found too late. But it was the last hope on earth of Jocelyn de Burgh.

The ring was heavy; it would take the paper to earth. And if it made things no better, it could make them no worse, no matter who found it. And it might be found too late for the girl who threw it, but in time to point out her murderer.

For with unerring eyes Jocelyn had read the look in Hugo's. And it was a death-warrant.

"I never meant to send that ring till I could stand clear of all he thinks about me," she mused, looking from that window that was surely never meant to see out of; "but I can't help it. To die here will not clear me; and if he doesn't believe me, at least I've told him the truth."

The thought made her flinch a little. Would he believe her? Would he believe anything so wild against Hugo de Burgh from a girl he had never trusted?

Well, perhaps he would never be given the chance! He might never get the strange little packet tied with the long lock of chestnut hair.

As she strained her eyes from the window her head felt dizzy; she caught at the window-frame for support, and cut her hand with the broken glass. At first the pain steadied her; then the blood that stained her handkerchief made her sick and faint. She slipped to the floor and lay down, her head on her arm; she had done all she could, there was nothing left now but to wait—to wait, perhaps, for days, till death had compassion on her.

It was getting dusk now, the wind through the broken pane was cold. She shivered as she lay, but her misery took away her fear of Hugo. Once she moaned quietly.

"Oh, Willie, my Willie!" she said, and then not a sound. The cold winter wind came on her icily, the darkness began to creep into the room that was never very light, but neither cold nor darkness roused her where she lay, very silent, with great, wide eyes that stared into the hopeless hours before her, where death every minute would stand nearer and more pale.

CHAPTER XXV.

HER CHRISTIAN NAME.

Lord Huntley stood at the great door of Castle De Burgh toward five o'clock, with a face that made the servant who had answered his ring look curiously at him. He turned to get into his trap, hesitated, and then spoke to the man again.

"Mr. De Burgh and Miss De Burgh are not at home, you said. Has Mr. Gilbert come in?"

"No, sir; not yet."

Then he could not have come back from Glen Farm. Huntley, with a curt word, sent his trap and servant home. He was more angry than he had ever been in his life, for the "Not at home" was a piece of cowardly impertinence. He knew quite well that Hugo was in and Moyra, too.

"He will not see me, and he won't let Moyra. There's something wrong, for he's afraid. I'll see Gilbert, and find out if he had heard anything, if I wait here all night, or walk to Glen Farm to get him!" he thought grimly, turning to the garden and the short cut to the Moores.

Hugo's room was on the other side of the house; he would be most unlikely to see that only the servant, and not Huntley, drove away down the great avenue.

"Though I don't care a d——d what he sees!" the latter reflected, striding through the garden. "He is behaving in a most idiotic way. I wonder why he won't see me! He doesn't know I take any interest in that poor girl."

His foot crushed a bit of broken glass as he crossed the lawn by the side door, but he did not notice it; though broken glass on a neat lawn is not usual. Too worried and troubled to smoke, he gained the gate into the highroad and stood there waiting. Surely Gilbert would come down the path in a minute or two!

"I hope he's done more than I have," Huntley thought gloomily. For he had spent the early part of his afternoon in a hunt through the village for Jocelyn? There was not a house left unvisited that could take a lodger, under the pretext that a friend of his wanted some rooms in Presteigne-de-Burgh. Not one of the women there had a lodger, he could swear to that; and, meantime, where could his little love have gone?

He wondered if she could be out on the mountains, or, worse still, trudging the lonely roads on her way to London. He would wait for Gilbert, and if he knew nothing—Lord Huntley, of Holycross, swore that in a day or two he would! But he felt pretty sure she had joined her father somewhere.

Hello! There was Gilbert now.

Huntley went to meet him.

"Well!" he cried. "Any news?"

"News! Yes, plenty." Gilbert's ruddy face was ghastly; he looked ten years older.

"It's bad, I know," the other man said sharply; "quick, tell me! Haven't they seen her?"

"Who? The girl? I'd forgotten all about her!"

"Forgotten all about her! By George! what did you go there for?"

"Something put her out of my head!"

Gilbert stopped short in the middle of the highroad.

"Hold hard, Huntley!" he said. "I've had a most awful shock! I don't know where I am, or what to think. I did hear news of the girl—or, rather, something about her. But none of them know where she is."

"What did you hear, then? Not that"—he could hardly bring out the words—"that Hugo was right in sending her off like that?"

"No, no! He—I don't know how to tell you."

He turned his face away as if he were in unbearable pain of mind. All his world seemed to be shattered. His brother, his mother—she had been a poor sort of mother to the son she despised. Perhaps she would have despised him now had she known how he suffered for her.

"Go on, man!" Huntley glanced at him with an impatience he could not hide. "What's wrong?"

"Everything," with a sort of groan. "I wouldn't tell even you; but it's bound to come out. Look here! you remember the trouble about my father?" hoarsely. "Well, Richard's out!"

"What of that? You can put him back again!"

"Never, while I have life in me," passionately. "I've seen him, talked to him. He's as sane as you or I—always has been. Good God! Huntley, he swears he never did it."

"Then who did?" wonderingly.

"I won't tell you. Some one else can tell my shame."

Gilbert's lips trembled, and Huntley, with a sudden understanding, thought of that strange letter from Meredith that was in his pocket.

Then it had been Alicia? For a moment he stood dumb.

"I feel—but it doesn't matter," Gilbert said miserably. "It will all come out, I'll have time enough then to think how I feel. And Richard has been shut up for nineteen years for what he never did. He's got a witness."

"What makes you believe him?" Huntley asked bluntly.

"Because I remember that the woman disappeared that very night. And, another thing, boy as I was, I never thought Dick did it."

"He must have," was all Huntley could find to say, but the damning evidence in his pocket went against the words. "Come home, old chap," he added tenderly; "come home, and think it over."

"I can't; I don't know what to think. Listen that girl—Miss Brown—well, she is Dick's daughter. Hugo must know all this, and only I have been in the dark while Dick suffered for another. I'd rather I'd done it myself."

"Dick's daughter! You're dreaming."

But a hundred things cropped up in his mind to confirm it. For one, she was the image of Gilbert himself.

"What's Hugo done with her?" he said between his teeth. "He'll pay for it, whatever it is."

"We'll all pay," said Gilbert. "Come home with me, Huntley. I'm about done with it all, and I've got to see Hugo."

"Does he know where Richard is?"

Gilbert shook his head.

"I had to promise not to tell him. You don't know what it is, Huntley. A frightful wrong on one side, and on the other——" he could not go on.

Huntley slipped his arm through Gilbert's, and the man leaned on him as though his very soul was weary.

"You've better brains than I, Billy," he said, as they crossed the garden that was cold, now the sun was down. "Think for me what I ought to do."

But Huntley's heart was hot within him for the girl he had known as Miss Brown.

"I don't know," he muttered, longing to wring Hugo's neck, and wondering if all the strange tales were true. "He wouldn't see me just now."

"He's got to see me," said the younger brother, with a black look. "Billy, I'd be happy if I thought my mother was dying now."

"My poor chap!" very pitifully. "Look out, there's something under your foot. A packet or a letter," he stooped mechanically and picked it up; as he looked at it an oath broke from him.

"It's a letter to me!" He tore off the soft hair that bound it, and there fell to the ground his own ring.

"What?" said Gilbert stupidly. "A letter for you?"

In the growing dusk Huntley read the few lines, and then, in a voice Gilbert had never heard, he called down the wrath of God on Hugo de Burgh.

"Read it," he cried, thrusting the torn paper into Gilbert's hand. "Read it, and you'll know what to think of Hugo!"

"I promised once to send you your ring if I wanted you. I want you now, but not only because I love you. They say I've gone away, but I am shut up in the tower above the side door. Oh, my Willie, if you love me come for me. Mr. De Burgh shut me up because I would not tell him about my father. Please come quickly, for I can't hold out. He says he will never let me out till I tell, and I'll never tell. If you get this too late, remember that I loved you till I died, and that I never loved another soul. Don't forget me. I will sign my name, as I promised you, perhaps I'll never sign it again.

"JOCELYN DE BURGH."

"My father never did it. Willie, Martha Hewitt knows. If you have loved me, help him, and help me, if you can. It will be too late tomorrow."

The bald, disjointed sentence brought a lump into Huntley's throat.

"Hush! don't speak!" he whispered, catching Gilbert by the arm. "I must get her out; you must help."

But Gilbert was staring at the letter, as one who was waked from a fool's paradise to find his home a den of thieves.

"It's no good going to Hugo," he said quite quietly. "He'd outwit us. But do you know what all this will mean to us?"

"If you won't help me, I'll go alone."

Gilbert turned to him, his teeth set.

"I'll help you if we're hung for it," he said, and in silence the two went into the house, and up to Gilbert's room, meeting no one. "Where is this tower? I mean, how do you get to it?" Huntley said, chafing at Gilbert's delay.

"The stair door is never used; it's opposite Hugo's rooms," dryly. "We've now got to see where he is first. It's a trifle, no doubt, but it's his house and his servants, and he'd call the men and stop our going if he knew."

Huntley laughed grimly. Once roused, not all the devils in hell could stop him; he cared not one jot for a villain like Hugo de Burgh.

"Here," Gilbert threw him a pair of thin shoes, "put these on. Your boots would bring Hugo out like a shot, and we can't run any risks for the girl's sake. That note was shaky—I don't believe she's had food."

His face was white, as a brave man who sees his death, for the knowledge of his mother's crime was more bitter than a thousand deaths. But he stood looking for something in a drawer, as if he were not in torture.

"Come on, I'll show you," he said quietly. "But I could wish it was any one but me."

Huntley did not notice what it was he slipped into his pocket.

Silently the two passed through the long, empty corridors, till they reached Hugo's door. It was ajar, but they dared not stop; his ears were like a hare's.

Through the half-open door there floated out a mist of cigarette smoke; inside they could hear, in the quiet, the quick scratching of a pen. Hugo, in security, was writing a letter to Meredith that was as false in its facts as it was real in its venom.

Scarcely breathing, Gilbert tried the unused door; it was locked. With a quick gesture he took a key from his pocket and slipped it in. It fitted, and noiseless as two ghosts the two men passed through, locking the door behind them. But careful as Gilbert was, the lock grated.

He caught Huntley by the arm. Hugo had heard!

Whether he had or not, they could not tell. But he came quickly out into the corridor and stood irresolute. Then, with one dextrous movement, he tried the door, but it was fast, as he had left it.

"Bah! I'm getting nervous," he muttered, each word distinct to the breathless listeners. The next minute they heard him go back to his room.

Gilbert, still grasping Huntley, moved on up the stairs. Not till they were on the first landing did he speak.

"Wait, I've a candle," he whispered. Huntley's heart beat thickly as he stared about him in its flickering light. "It was lucky about the key," Gilbert went on. "I have a turn for locks, and I hunted up all the old keys I could find once for fun. Mine is the right key. Hugo had to get another made, for I mislaid this. I only found it a few weeks ago. I had to keep you waiting while I found it."

He turned without hesitation into the passage Jocelyn had followed the night before, and up the stairs.

"Here's the door," he said sharply. "You open it. I can't. I never saw the girl, and all this will mean——" he swallowed thickly.

Huntley shot the bolt back and stood gazing into the cold darkness of the tower room. It was well thought of for a prison, no one ever went up those stairs, for a story as dark as Alicia's own clung to them.

The icy air of the winter night was cold on Huntley's face, but as he gazed he could see no one.

"Where are you?" he whispered. Then he saw. On the floor, by the window, lay the girl he loved, a senseless heap, one outflung hand bound with a bloody handkerchief, her long hair streaming on the stones. He set the candle anywhere, and was kneeling by her side.

"Sweetheart, it's I!" he said, raising her, sick at heart as he saw her head fall backward lifelessly. "Wake up, my little love, look at me."

But she never stirred.

With a quick motion he gathered her to his breast.

"Sweetheart, try!" he pleaded. "You're safe now. Do you think anyone could touch you here, in my arms?"

From very far away his voice reached her, but not the meaning of the words; the cold and hunger, the pain of her cut hand had dulled her senses. A cold sickness on her, she opened her eyes, but only to close them again with a sigh of relief.

"I thought you'd come," he caught, but just caught, the murmur, and as he rose to his feet with her close in his arms, he saw she had fainted again.

As if he could not feel the weight that was so dear, he carried her out to where Gilbert waited, and pointed in silence to the scarlet bandage round her hand.

Gilbert had no words as he looked at the girl. He stumbled as he went back for the candle, and fumbled a long time as he bolted the door. It would be as well that Hugo should find things as he left them.

For all he had taken his stand with Richard he could not feel glad as each fresh count against Hugo was proved.

He turned to Huntley as he shot the bolt home.

"We've got here, and we've found her!" he said. "But has it occurred to you how we are to get out? We might open that lower door straight on Hugo."

But Huntley was listening to something far away, not to Gilbert.

"Quick!" he cried, under his breath. "Pinch out that candle so that it can't smell. I hear someone now at that door."

They were in the dark before the words were out of his mouth. Gilbert caught him by the arm and dragged him down the winding stair toward the noise, but also toward the landing where the four passages branched off into unknown depths of darkness. Into the nearest one they rushed, and stood flat in its gloom against the wall, both thankful the girl had fainted.

Don't Miss the Tragic Ending

This story has reached a climax, the situation is desperate, the stage is set for a tragic finish which comes in a startling, astonishing form of fearful retribution, as told in the last three chapters of "Love and Spite" to appear in December COMFORT.

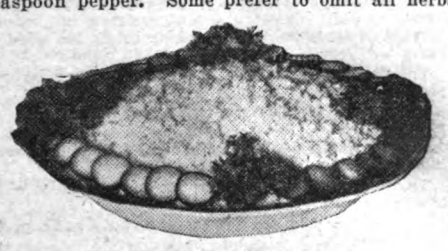
THANKSGIVING DAY is such a joyous occasion that it is anticipated long beforehand by all the members of the family as well as by the housewife who has to plan the feast and festivities. It is a day of home-comings, of reunions, of merry making and holiday pleasures, with the glorious climax of the best dinner of the year. For no dinner ever tastes quite so good or is hailed with more enthusiasm than the bountiful repast of Thanksgiving Day. For weeks preceding the happy day itself, the housewife is extremely busy searching out new ideas for her family,—new concoctions for the dinner, new decorations for the table, new jokes and amusements to increase the fun. More than most holidays Thanksgiving is fortunately still a day of traditions. What dinner could be complete without the roasted turkey, the cranberry sauce, the plum pudding, or pies, and the fruit? On that day every one loves to see a veritable harvest of plenty on the table before him,—such a wealth of good things that each heart cannot help but be filled with a real feeling of appreciation and thanksgiving.

For the centerpiece for the Thanksgiving table, nothing is more attractive and harmonious than fruits, or vegetables. Many are the designs that the artistic hand can use in arranging a basket of red apples, bright-colored oranges, bananas, pears, and here and there over the top small bunches of grapes. Dates rolled in sugar, figs, raisins, and nuts all add to the picture of plenty. There are innumerable shapes, sizes and kinds of baskets and bowls that may be charmingly used to contain the fruit, and even "homely" provision baskets, if small enough, can be gracefully twined with leaves and fern, and piled high with the yield of the orchards. It often adds greatly to the beauty of the table to trim it with autumn leaves, collected when the trees are in their most gorgeous coloring, pressed with a hot waxed iron, and kept till some festive party.



THE NATIONAL THANKSGIVING BIRD.

Ferns, too, gathered in the summer, can be beautifully preserved between the pages of a heavy book until they are wanted for decoration. Thus does the wise housewife begin her plans early in the season for the happiest holiday of the fall.

Besides baskets there are all sorts of centerpieces that can be made from vegetables. A big round yellow pumpkin, scrubbed till its sides shine, can be scooped out at the top, lined with paraffin paper and filled with fruits and nuts. Even cabbages have been made into lovely bowls for fruit. Sheaves of wheat and ears of red corn on the stalk, when they can be obtained, are wonderfully decorative and strings of the deep red cranberries can also be used to furnish effective splashes of color. The choice of ornaments for the table is truly as rich as the harvest itself and it is indeed well worth while to plan for decorations that shall fitly express the spirit of the day. Some New England families have been known to place at each plate a few kernels of parched corn as a reminder of the first Thanksgiving Day of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, held after the season of famine when a few grains of corn had been their only food.

The dinner itself is the center of interest of the day. Menus for other dinners may vary, but for this one nothing is more welcome than the sight of the steaming turkey with its luscious brown crust and its fat sides almost bursting with the good stuffing it contains. In some families goose or duck supplant the King of the Barnyard, but the turkey generally reigns supreme.

Although most housewives have their pet recipes for stuffing the fowl there may be some who would like a variation. A good recipe for stuffing is as follows: For one large turkey, break into small pieces two small loaves of stale bread, moisten with one cup of hot water, one third cup of melted butter, and one well-beaten egg. Add a small onion finely chopped, two teaspons sweet marjoram, one teaspoon sage, one teaspoon salt, one half teaspoon grated nutmeg, one quarter teaspoon clove, and one quarter teaspoon pepper. Some prefer to omit all herbs and spices except sage and pepper, in which case the portion of sage leaves should be largely increased.

With the turkey the indispensable cranberry sauce or jelly adds flavor and a pretty bit of color. A simple method of making cranberry sauce is to cook one quart of cranberries in three cups of water until they are thoroughly soft, then add three cups sugar, and boil until the desired consistency is reached. If a thin sauce is wanted, a few minutes cooking will suffice; if a jelly is preferred, the mixture should be cooked until very thick. Remove from the stove and mash through a strainer, and pour into moulds to jelly.

Potatoes are a necessary adjunct for this day. The kitchen is so crowded with dishes and preparations that it is wiser to select a fairly simple process when possible. An excellent way is to mash the potatoes, season with salt, pepper and butter. Pile the mixture lightly in a baking dish, brush on the top the white of an egg, diluted with a teaspoonful of cold water and brown in a hot oven. Pickled beets, or some other bright colored vegetable may be used as a garnish.

Onions have been associated with the typical Thanksgiving dinner for many years, and because of their decided flavor they are very acceptable with the mildly seasoned meat of the turkey. Boiled onions served in a cream sauce are delicious. To make the sauce, melt two tablespoons of butter, mix in thoroughly three tablespoons of flour, and add one and one half cups of milk, three quarters teaspoon of salt, and one eighth teaspoon of pepper. Stir carefully until the sauce thickens. After boiling the onions in several waters until they are tender, drain them, sprinkle lightly with salt and pepper and when ready to serve, pour the cream sauce over them.

Steamed squash can be prettily served in the shell or in a dish. Remove the top of a Hubbard squash and steam until tender. Scoop out the pulp, mash the soft portion through a coarse strainer and season with salt, pepper and butter. Fill the shell or dish with this mixture and wrap a paper napkin around it to make it more attractive.

Sometimes if you wish a more elaborate dinner you can serve a sherbet or frappe after the roast. Its coldness and its flavor are very refreshing after the hearty meat course. The following is a recipe for cranberry sherbet: To two cups of sweetened cranberry sauce, add a syrup made by boiling one and one half cups of sugar in three cups of water for ten minutes. Strain, cool, and freeze with one part salt to two parts ice.

The serving of a salad is a mere matter of choice. Since there is such an abundance of other "goodies," this can easily be dispensed with. If however, it is desired, it is well to choose a simple one. Plain lettuce with French dressing or a fruit salad of chopped apple, sliced oranges and nuts, with cream dressing fit well into the menu.

But what is salad compared to the dessert, and how, on top of all the good things that have been already eaten, is it going to be possible to do justice to the pies and puddings that look so tempting? Surely laughter and happy conversation must help to make food easily digested, for somehow the desserts always get the reception that they should. It is difficult indeed, almost impossible, to suggest new desserts for this special day. Nothing tastes better than the old-fashioned mince and pumpkin pie such as have graced the board for many years. It is possible, however, to find new ways of making the steamed plum pudding and the sauce to go with it. A good recipe for plum pudding is as follows: Chop and cream one cup of suet, add to it two cups bread crumbs which have been soaked in one cup of milk for thirty minutes. To the well-beaten yolks of three eggs, add one and one half cups of brown sugar, one half teaspoon of salt, one teaspoon of cinnamon, one teaspoon of nutmeg, and one teaspoon of clove. Combine with the suet and bread crumbs, and mix thoroughly. Add the grated rind and juice of one lemon, one cup of currants, one cup of seeded and chopped raisins dredged with one quarter cup flour, and one third cup finely chopped citron. Fold in the stiffly beaten egg whites. Steam in a buttered tin for four hours. Serve with a hard sauce made by creaming one cup of powdered sugar with one third cup of butter, and flavored by one teaspoon of vanilla and a grating of nutmeg.

Fruit, nuts and coffee, may add to the gala repast, and in New England it is not complete without new cider. A pretty idea is to stuff figs with marshmallows. Put the figs into a strainer set on top of the kettle and steam from four to five minutes. Cut off the bottom end of each fig and insert the handle of a spoon to make an opening. Into this push a marshmallow, cover it completely with the skin of the fig and roll the fig in powdered sugar.

Ask Yourself This Question

It is important for reasons of health and practical economy for every housekeeper to ask herself this question:

"Do I prefer a pure baking powder like Royal Baking Powder, made of cream of tartar derived from grapes, or am I willing to use a baking powder made of alum or phosphate, both derived from mineral sources?"

The names of the ingredients printed on the label show whether the kind you are now using or any brand, new or old, that may be offered is a genuine cream of tartar powder, or merely a phosphate or alum compound.

Royal Baking Powder contains no alum nor phosphate and leaves no bitter taste in the food.

ing or take a day off for such rough work. Part in love, the morning may never come to some of us. Bury your past troubles and call not forth the future. "Good night," with a beautiful thing to say! Dream if you like of days gone by and happy childhood scenes. Good night is a song of memory as I hear it now from my two children who are away from me.

A friend once had a dear little boy who said, as he kissed his father good night, "Good by till morning comes." And now that the child is with God that good by is ever fresh in his father's memory, till morning in a world that shall know no night.

I will close with a prayer:

"Lord, as I journey day by day,
Along life's rough and rugged way,
I ask not that my path should be
From pain and sorrow ever free.
Nor that within my home so dear
No grief shall come, no saddened tear,
But this I ask, on bended knee,
For strength and grace, dear Lord, from Thee,
To bear whatever Thou should'st send,
Brave and unfaltering to the end."

MRS. ROBERT R. GOLDEN.

PANA, ILL.

DEAR SISTERS:

It is with intense pleasure that I note an effort is at last being made by a few of the COMFORT family to show, in a substantial way, their appreciation of Uncle Charlie's years of devoted efforts to minister to the sick and to aid and uplift the well. What we are attempting to do now should have been done years ago, then Uncle Charlie could have had just that much care and worry lifted from his shoulders. I am sure it has simply been thoughtlessness on our part.

The sincere Christian spirit that breathes through all the letters in the Sisters' Corner shows that we must have tens of thousands of devoted followers of the Master among the COMFORT family. Now, unless that spirit is a real, viril, living thing, not merely the drooling of spiritual platitudes, so typical of so many superficial Christians who mistake piety for righteousness, words for deeds and faith for accomplishments, we shall never surround Uncle Charlie with that brick and mortar evidence of our love, sympathy and appreciation, which our hands could so readily and instantly rear if we would all apply ourselves with heart and soul to this inspiring task.

I have had a great deal of experience with charitable work and it has been my experience that out of one hundred people, ninety-nine will talk but only one will actually perform and do. If those who so constantly have the name of the Deity on their lips would repeat to themselves at least half-a-dozen times a day, "Faith without works is dead," it would work wonders and they would find that words as a substitute for deeds would find little acceptance in the sight of Him who said, "Feed my lambs!"

Now sisters, in this case let us cut out the talking and all get to work.

I have Uncle Charlie's picture book; his home is a very modest little place but modest homes in the city cost much and I figure that at least fifty thousand of us must get at least one subscription to COMFORT or fifteen thousand of us get four before this inspiring project can be put through. Uncle Charlie, I know, has millions of admirers, but there is a vast gulf between admirers and helpful friends. Now we've all got to quit this admiring business and get out and hustle. I have found such an immense amount of delight and satisfaction in Uncle Chalie's books and in COMFORT that I have introduced the magazine to all my friends and I have placed that wonderful book, Uncle Charlie's poems, the most delightful gift and the best collection of genuinely funny verse ever written, in a hundred homes. That means I have been busy and the work has been a delight to me as it would be to anyone else who has the inspiration to indulge in it. Let us get busy so that by Christmas Day we can have Uncle Charlie in his own COMFORT home. I'm willing to do the work of twenty of you, and more if time and strength permit but this should be a labor of love for us all; for a few hundred of us to put this project through would be a poor testimonial, a poor exhibition of our appreciation of his great and noble work, for we every one love him. Every one could do a little, but, better still, let's all do much! Let us do what Billy Sunday's admirers do for him—thirty to forty thousand dollars for a few weeks' healthy shouting. Can't we, six million of us, do as much as that for a sick and helpless brother who has labored in the Master's cause for twenty bedridden years? We can do it and we will! Once more, let us get busy for this is a work that brings its own reward.

I am sending in twelve subscriptions for a start.

"Give as you would if an angel
Awaited your gift at the door;
Give as you would if tomorrow
Found you where waiting was o'er;
Give as you would to the Master
If you met His searching look;
Give as you would of your substance,
If His hand your offering took."

We have taken COMFORT twenty years and love every bit of it.

With love to each one of the sisters,

I am, yours for Uncle Charlie's Home,
MARY E. NEELY.

Mary Neely. With Uncle Charlie's thanks in this issue I feel that anything I could say would be superfluous but your inspiring letter deserves mention and surely it should be the means of arousing the drones in COMFORT's hive to action. But by this I don't want those who have sent in smaller sums of money or fewer subscriptions to feel that their work is any the less appreciated on that account, for it is not, but lack of space prevents me from thanking all as they deserve—if indeed I were able to express my thanks in mere words. In the October editorial our Editor explained the whys and wherefores of the Home Fund idea and if any of the new readers are in doubt as to the purpose back of this generosity, I would advise them to acquaint themselves with the true facts before passing judgment.—Ed.

—, ALABAMA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

My sympathy certainly went out to the unloved wife but there are thousands that are just as unwelcome and as unloved. If we are not able to work like slaves for our husbands the majority of them will "grouch" at us and tell us that's what they married us for.

I left my husband once because I got disgusted with his drinking and grouching but he turned over a new leaf, enough to quit the drinking so we are living together again. I took my two children and went to Missouri. But it's just as I say—few of them love a woman unless she is able to meet all their expectations. But married life isn't as hard as it used to be when I was soft and let him have all the say and do all the bossing. When he starts it now I just buck up and say: "See here, there is just as much room in this world for me as there is for you and if we can't live without bossing and fighting I better commence too and see how you like it," and I don't act as gentle or loving as I used to, no matter how much I would like to. It does them good to have a woman act a little distant.

You may print my name if you like.

Love to all, MRS. W. M. H.

Mrs. W. M. H. Even though you were sincere enough to offer to let me use your name, I hardly think I will for, sometime, it might cause unpleasantness. It has been interesting to note the change in letters this month from last. Then they were all from the loving, clinging-vine type of woman while this month they are just the opposite and from women who are prepared to defend their rights or else from those who started married life on an equal basis so that there would be no occasion for them to fight for what they considered theirs by right. I wonder which is the better plan? What do the rest say about it?—Ed.

—, OREGON.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I'm sorry that I did not subscribe for COMFORT sooner as I should like to read the sister's letter from Yorkshire, Ohio. I thought Mattie Fugitt's letter worth the price of the paper. It is right after my own heart. I think this race suicide is one of the worst evils of this age. I know several couples who are separated whom I believe would be living happily together if they had had children. This is a fast age and people don't want to take time to care for little children. They live idle, selfish lives and drift apart more easily than if their minds were upon their little treasures.

I am a proud and happy mother of three children and I think the comfort and pleasure we get out of

The Doings of The Dapperlings

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1916, by Lena B. Ellingwood.
(All rights reserved.)

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTER.—The Dapperlings are kind-hearted, gay little elf-like beings who ride on rabbits and never let themselves be seen by human eyes because of their belief that, if seen, it would bring some terrible calamity upon them. But Nattie, the Smallest Dapperling of All, has watched five-year-old Simmie-Sammie and his sister Pittysing, nearly two years older, while at play and is not afraid of them. She would play with these children if the Dapperling rules permitted, and she does meddle with their playthings slyly and unseen, much to their bewilderment.

CHAPTER II.

THE LOST DOLL

See front cover illustration

THE children lived in a pretty white house with a nice lawn and flower-beds in front, just at the edge of the village. Back of the house there was a green field, all dotted with wild flowers. A path had been worn across the field and down a gentle slope at the farther side, to where, with its border of small trees and bushes, ran the little Mill Brook. It was a beautiful place to play.

There was nothing left of the old mill, which had given the brook its name, but a few rotting timbers further down, where the brook was wider.

In the pasture across the brook, a little farther up the stream, was the hillside where the Dapperlings lived, and now, as I promised before, I'll tell you about their houses.

It was because they must be hidden from real people that the Dapperlings lived on side hills. You see, it was this way. The houses were built right into the side of the hill, with doors and windows in front, and the Dapperlings went to call on each other and skipped around over the hill, very friendly and happy, WHEN THEY WERE BY THEMSELVES! But let any real people come anywhere near, and every Dapperling went inside, and whisk! quick as a wink those houses turned right around, INTO THE HILL, and there was the grass all growing without a break, and you never would have guessed anybody lived there at all. For, don't you see, the grass grew right on the backs of the houses, and the houses could turn either way.

Inside the hill were little tunnels going from one house to another.

And way back in the hill was a big room, or cave, large enough to hold the whole village full of Dapperlings, where they could play games and have parties. They called it by a very grand name—the assembly hall.

Mostly it was dark in there, but they lighted it with lamps when they wanted to, and they could let a little sunlight into it, too, in this way. It came very near the top of the ground in one place, and there they had a hole cut through, which they covered over with a little trap door.

Over this trap door, on the outside, they put a covering of moss, to hide it, and all around it were planted thistles—rough, sharp, prickly thistles.

"Enough to keep anybody away from the place, I should think!" That was what old Shandle-Spinx said when he planted them.

But I'm going to tell you how Pittysing, one day, DIDN'T keep away!

The Smallest Dapperling of All was out alone one morning, near the Mill Brook, hoping she'd see the children. By and by they came.

Pittysing had a new doll. A cunning little doll, with yellow curls and a red mouth that always smiled. She was just six inches tall, exactly the right size to make clothes for. It didn't need much cloth for a dress, and scraps of lace left from other things were fine for trimmings.

Pittysing sat down on a little wooden box she kept there for a seat, and spread out on the barrel-top table the things she had brought. Beside the doll, she had a needle with a long thread tied into it, a pair of very small, very bright embroidery scissors, and a piece of beautiful pink silk.

Simmie-Sammie stood watching her. There was a worried pucker just above Pittysing's nose, and her lips never once smiled. She was trying to plan how she could make a dress out of the silk. There was a little hole in it, and the hole didn't come in the right place to use it for the neck of the dress or an armhole either. So she turned it this way and that, holding it up to the doll, who kept on smiling.

Simmie-Sammie's face lighted up with a big idea.

"I know, Pittsy," he said. "I tell you just what you can do. Cut the hole out."

Pittysing looked at him sharply. No, he wasn't trying to be smart, or to tease her. He meant well, but, being only a boy, of course he knew nothing about making dresses. She smiled at him pityingly, then jumped up and dropped the things on the table.

"Oh, come on!" she said. "We'll go wading! I've worked long enough for one morning."

The Smallest Dapperling of All wanted to go into the water with them; wanted to play with them, wanted to laugh with them! But she couldn't.

She watched them for a while, then went back to the table and took the doll. She looked into its eyes and hugged it hard, then started for home with it. Dapperlings don't have dolls. She didn't mean to keep it, oh, no! But she thought she would try to get Lulie Wye Dapperling, who knew how to make beautiful dresses, to make one for the doll. Then she would carry it back, and how pleased and surprised Pittysing would be!

She heard the children's mother calling, "Pittysing! come quick! Papa's going to take you and Simmie-Sammie for a ride."

The children snatched up their shoes and stockings and ran home, never once thinking of the doll.

(You're wondering how Pittysing got into the Dapperlings' underground hall? Well, do be patient, and take the story as it comes.)

Lulie Wye made the doll a beautiful dress of fine, blue gauzy stuff, with yellow buttercup petals pasted on for trimming, like embroidery done with yellow silk. Then she stood the doll up in one corner of the assembly hall, and invited all the Dapperlings to march around in single file, to see it.

The doll smiled at them all, and kept on smiling, even when the lights were put out, and she was left standing there alone in the dark. Perhaps the doll didn't have much sense, but at least she wasn't afraid of the dark, which is more than can be said of some children. There wasn't anything to be afraid of.

The Smallest Dapperling of All was sent down to Lone Cedar Knoll that afternoon to get a basket of checkerberries for supper. It was a lovely spot, with the dark green leaves and bright red checkerberries covering the knoll like a carpet. The children sometimes went there, but never alone, for it was a rule that they musn't go farther south than the Big Cracked Rock, nor farther east than the pasture fence, nor farther north than the Pine Tree on the Hill, nor farther west than Grandma Brown's house, unless their mother said they might.

Nattie filled her basket and started for home, but stopped by the Mill Brook for a while to watch Pittysing, who had come back from her ride and was hunting for the doll. The needle and thread were there, and the pink silk, but the doll and the scissors were gone.

"Oh, how I wish I'd left mamma's embroidery scissors alone!" she said. "And oh, my poor, dear little doll! Why, I haven't even named her yet, and now I've lost her."

Simmie-Sammie was hunting, too.

Cattie Puss was with them, rubbing against the legs of the table, and getting in Pittysing's way.

"Oh, scat!" cried poor, worried Pittysing. "As if I didn't have enough to bear, without tumbling over yellow cats every time I step! SCAT, why don't you?" And she stamped her foot.

At that, Cattie Puss ran, almost knocking over the Smallest Dapperling of All. She did tip over the basket of checkerberries, and Nattie had to go way back to Lone Cedar Knoll to get more, for she didn't dare to pick up the spilled ones so near the children. Simmie-Sammie found the checkerberries soon after, and ate them, wondering how they came there.

"Quick as ever I can, I'll carry that doll back," said the Smallest Dapperling of All to a friendly little spotted toad who was watching her pick her berries. The toad didn't answer, but winked his bright little eyes as though he understood.

Chapter III, in December COMFORT, will tell of a strange mishap that befell Pittysing in connection with the recovery of her lost doll and the trouble it made for the Dapperlings. See that your subscription is renewed so not to miss it.

Crumbs of Comfort

Love is the energy of life.
They pray best who live best.
Money brightens as it takes its flight.
Gratitude is the memory of the heart.
Great joy is always near great sorrow.
Life is not a holiday, but an education.
Money buys pleasure, but not happiness.
Omission of good is a commission of evil.
Bad examples are like contagious diseases.

December Comfort

sunning over with Christmas cheer, will issue early and its timely suggestions will help our readers in planning and arranging their holiday festivities. Don't miss the tragic ending of "Love and Spite" in December COMFORT, to be followed by another thrilling serial story by Adelaide Stirling.

Special Features for December

I HAVE something to say to you this month which should bring the blush of shame to every American cheek. Mothers and fathers especially I want you to give me your attention. Take the cotton wool out of your ears, every one of you for what I am going to tell you strikes at every home in the land.

How many of you know that our young women are being sold on the auction block in the white slave marts in our big cities, sometimes for as little as a dollar a pound; sold just as meat and groceries are sold. Don't think that this traffic is only going on in the cities, for its ramifications extend to every corner of the land, and the loneliest farm is not safe from the terror that walks by night, and the pestilence that stalks by noonday.

We have an infantile paralysis epidemic here in New York, and every terrified mother is hugging her babe to her breast and wondering when its turn wil come. The plague has struck terror to all hearts. But there is a worse plague than infantile paralysis, for that plague is merciful, inasmuch as there are five chances to one that the baby may survive,—anyway if it dies it can be given decent burial. But what of the white slave monster? Once its dripping jaws close on its victims they are never seen or heard of more. In a few months or five years at the outside they are dead. Over the beds of the victim of infantile paralysis, loving eyes watch and science extends its merciful hands of relief. Even if the body succumbs, the soul at least is not destroyed, but the monsters that control the white slave traffic have no mercy for their victims, they die like rats in a sewer, unwept and unhonored. No loving eyes watch them as the faltering breath ebbs slowly away; alone and neglected they meet death, and the potter's field claims their poor, wretched, diseased bodies. The officers of the law who should protect your daughters, the officers who know where every den of infamy is located and who could free these wretched victims of man's villainy, help to bar the doors of the hell holes that hold them, and take a part of the earnings of sin and shame from the fiendish monsters who own these stockades of vice and control this villainous traffic.

When officers of the law join hands with the white slaver to exploit and strike down the fairest flowers of our land and to despoil our homes, what protection have we got? None whatever! None but the good right arms of you fathers and brothers, and the insistent voices of your anguished mothers.

Every two or three years some monster falls into the clutches of a police officer here or there, who is not lost to all sense of decency and shame, a man who realizes that he owes the public some service for the money he receives for that protection he so seldom gives, and then the lid is lifted and we are permitted to look into hell.

Recently in New York, a fiend in human form, one of the chief members of a vice trust that exploits tens of thousands of white slaves the country o'er, was arrested and made a clean breast to the District Attorney, and revealed, not with any sense of shame or regret, every detail of the damnable traffic in which he was engaged. Yushe Botwin is the name of this wretch, a native of Austria, fifty-seven years old. For twenty-five years this reptile has trafficked in women, and he has delivered to dive keepers, no less than five thousand girls, most of them school girls not over sixteen. His income from this traffic has averaged from five hundred to a thousand dollars a week.

When this monster was arrested, he was receiving the wages of sin from scores of wretched girls, held in vice dens in the underworld of New York.

This fiend brags that in the last ten years he personally has ruined and later enslaved a thousand school girls. That is at the rate of a hundred girls a year, or two a week. He was always careful to see that the girls were the daughters of poor parents.

Presents of candy and flashy jewelry won the girl's interest, then she was taken to cheap movie theaters, where the most demoralizing kind of pictures were displayed, the proprietors, according to his statement, standing in with the slavers, and receiving a commission for their part of the devilish work. Next came visits to garish cabarets and restaurants where the girl was encouraged, or forced to drink; later came the inevitable automobile rides, at the end of which the victim found herself in a den of vice from which, even if she wanted to, she would be too broken in spirit, too crushed, degraded and diseased, to seek to escape.

Girls of about sixteen, fresh from the classroom, it appears, bring the highest price, dive keepers paying as much as five hundred dollars for girls of this type, while others less attractive often go at the rate of a dollar a pound. The slavers receive a commission of ten per cent on the earnings of these women; the slaves get nothing but food and a tawdry wrapper.

It is a strange thing, but when a girl disappears from a poverty-stricken home, a home where the parents know little of the laws and customs of this country, but have still enough sense to make every sacrifice for their children's education, nothing is said to the police about these sudden disappearances. Frequently the trapped victim is forced to write a letter to her parents, telling them that she has eloped and has a good husband. The letter is mailed from a distant western city, and the parents in the majority of cases make no fuss and cease to worry. Often when the family is large and the struggle for existence keen, the disappearance of a daughter brings relief instead of distress. This may seem terrible to those who live in happy, comfortable, well-regulated homes, but it will be easily understood by those who exist in the crowded tenements of New York's east side.

Women and well-groomed young men are used by the chiefs of the vice trust to entrap innocent young girls. It is reported that police detectives recently distributed tickets for a ball among store and factory girls, and then notified all the dive keepers, cadets, procurers and vampires of the underworld to be on hand to gather in the victims. What do you think of that?

Here is the story of a convent bred Irish immigrant who came to this country when but nineteen as told in a New York daily paper:

"With her jaw broken, her cheek bone fractured and half of her teeth knocked out because she dared to tell the grand jury and district attorney Smith the inside story of organized, police protected vice in New York, Miss Alice Henry is virtually a prisoner in her own room in terror of her life. She alleges that the white slave evil is as great as ever, and that one man controls the lives of fifteen hundred young women. Miss Henry declares her story involves a ring of police officers and politicians who share in this stupendous graft. Miss Henry has nothing but hatred for the country which flung her, a convent bred Irish immigrant, into the toils of white slavery. But listen to her story:

"When I came here I got a job as servant in Brooklyn and it was on my days out that I met Louis. He seemed like a nice, refined young fellow. I asked him about his folks and one day he invited me to go to supper at his 'aunt's' house. The woman he introduced as his aunt was pleasant spoken. Before supper was over Louis excused himself and when it got late and he hadn't got back I asked why, for I wanted to go home. Then the woman told me where I was. I tried to get away but she beat me and locked me in a room and took all my clothes away. The next day she gave me a silk wrapper and slippers and stockings to match, and had my hair dressed. There were thirty girls in this place. I refused to do the woman's bidding so she beat me and locked me up with very little to eat. I held out for days. For seven months I was not allowed out of the house, and for several years I was not allowed to go out alone. I could not write to anyone, I had no clothes to wear except a wrapper. Then when I did go out I found I was tied as much as before, because I could not get a job. I had no references ——— took all my money because Louis had sold me outright for one hundred and fifty dollars. He said he would save it for me but I never got a cent for the five years that I lived as a slave. All this t' e my sister didn't know where I was. She learned I had left my place suddenly, but though she hunted for me she could not find me, and after a time I didn't want her to."

It is more than a woman's life is worth, that is a woman of the underworld, to "squeal" as they call it in New York. This woman as you will see got her jaw broken, her cheek bone fractured and half of her teeth knocked out by detectives, because she gave evidence to the authorities of police participation in vice graft. But even then the police did not let up on her. It appears that a detective on the street tried to arrest her on the charge of accosting him, but luckily for her, men from the district attorney's office saw and heard what took place. Later however while she was sitting on the steps of the house in which she was living, a central office detective arrested her, refused to let her telephone and on the way to the station house called her a "stool pigeon" and other names. She says: "As we passed 34th Street, the policeman who refused to help me the night my jaw was broken, laughed and jeered. I spent the night in Jefferson Market jail but was released on five hundred dollar bail, and will be tried Tuesday night on the detective's charge."

Now you see what a woman, who tries to mind her own business and be decent is up against. If this poor soul had not spoken to a strange man on the street, she would probably have been spared all the shame and torture she has endured. Then again one must remember that a girl in domestic service, a stranger in a strange land, with little experience of city life, and of the fiends in human form who infest every community, seeks human companionship and as a rule the only place she can find it is on the street. No matter how guarded and careful a woman may be there are ways well known to the procurer of getting acquainted with a person he wishes to make his victim. In the city one does not know whom to trust and safety lies in trusting no one.

Before discussing what can be done to protect our homes and loved ones, I want you to read carefully a portion of a letter written by a highly educated college woman, a victim of the social evil, to the editor of a woman's department of a newspaper published in a big city of the middle west. We all know how you feel about this horror of white slavery, the traffic with which you are all familiar, which scarcely one of you has ever tried to prevent, but you don't know how the victims of the traffic think and feel. Listen if you would know, to this cry, a cry of warning, far more eloquent than anything I could ever pen, from a den in the underworld, from a stricken sister of yours to you self-satisfied, complacent mothers and indifferent fathers in your happy, comfortable homes:

"Will you let a woman of the underworld address you? Although there is never a word for the poor deluded creatures down here in the darkness, yet we like to read about you people up there in the light of day.

"For once I was fair as the purest snow,
But I fell, fell like the snowflakes—
From heaven to hell;
Cursing, pleading, afraid to die,
I sell my soul to whomever will buy.

"We, too, see the church spires in the disance, and on Sunday we hear the bells pealing. To me they only ring a knell to the Christian religion. For what are your churches doing? The preacher preaches about high ideals, clean politics, preaches right over your head. The old brother in the Amen corner, who has heard the sermon on clean politics, goes out and votes 'wet.' The girl who has heard the moral sermon, sits in the porch swing and lets the Sunday school boy hug and kiss her, while papa and mamma up-stairs dream of the golden future of their daughter. I have known men who sang in the church choir on Sundays and mingled with the ogres on Monday. The churches of today have lost sight of the lowly Nazarene, barefooted, healing the lepers and casting out devils. Greed I say has become the great force behind the pulpit, making the salvation of your souls a money-making scheme. How many of you Christian mothers teach your boys to respect your neighbor's daughters and protect their honor with their lives if need be? Why don't parents train their boys for purity of living? If they did their duty for their boys, you girls would be safe. I know a girl down here in sin who is a beautiful singer. She used to sing in a church choir in an Eastern city. The preacher led her to hell. Diseased, lost eternally she gropes about in the shadow of despair. What are your schools doing? Your teachers teach language and grammar and your boys come down here and curse and use the vilest language. Your boys grow up, vote for the saloon and the houses of vice which cater only to the lusts of men. They allow men to manufacture the deadly cigarette and by its manufacture they coin millions of dollars. Then you are taxed to keep up insane asylums for the boys and men whom the cigarette habit sends to the mad house. You allow some men to manufacture drugs, poison and liquors, so they can make a fortune and live in ease, while your sons pay the price. Visit some of the drunken brawls I have seen in my life of shame and tell me who pays? Although everything you write is for the betterment of humanity—yet how inconsistent. They (the papers) print things which make for impurity. For instance, movies? Nearly all deal with some phase of sin, the fallen women, drunkenness and murder, and mothers, foolish, blind women who call themselves by that sacred name—enter with little children. If you lived down here with me, you would see the result of your picture shows. Tell the blind mothers up there in your world to beware of the movies dealing with sin in any form. The moral lesson is lost sight of in the fascinating views of vice and crime. Beware of the first drink of beer or wine for your children. Beware of the motor cycle ride into the country with the nice boy friend. I don't care who he is—I say beware. Beware of the porch swing in the shadows while blind papa and mamma sleep up-stairs. I know. I have heard it all from young men who came here, and who will carry to your homes the burning curse. Beware of kissing parties. I went to perdition from a church entertainment—and I went with the preacher's son. It was the first kiss from a boy. Emboldened by that kiss, I allowed my beau to kiss me afterwards; now if a man kisses me he carries the venom to his grave.

"Do not try to reclaim us. We are diseased, blackened and bruised and only death can end our misery. All the joy, purity, love and light have fled from our souls and we are groping in the utter darkness. But for His sake you women who are really good, take your shovel out and fill up the pitfalls which Satan has dug for your children. Go now, while they are in youth's fair morning, before sin has blackened and tarnished their souls. Awake you who are sleeping, while out at the park your girl is turning her footsteps toward vice, and, listen! When that girl of yours has her name all tarnished and blackened by lust and vice, all the gold dust in the streets of heaven cannot remove the blackness therefrom, and it comes so easily—

'First a little mist then a cold, pitiless rain,
And life is never the same again.'"

I can hear all you good women saying: "Isn't this terrible, terrible, terrible." A number of good men will agree with the women that it is terrible and would like to stop it, though neither the good men nor the good women beyond denouncing the hideous thing have ever done anything to stop it or are ever likely to do anything to stop it. Of course they could stop it if they wished. We however, have put an end to black slavery. We waged one of the bloodiest wars in history to free black men and women from physical slavery, and right while that war was going on, with a hypocrisy and inconsistency peculiar to human nature, or inhuman nature, tens of thousands of white men were helping to enslave the daughters of other white men, and to perpetuate a form of slavery far more hideous and horrible than that which they were trying to abolish. It disheartens and disgusts me to see how some good people in some states (and in fact all states) can get excited about the saloon, and yet never say a single word about a more hideous institution, the vice den and the brothel. Unfortunately however, the women of this country have not been educated up to that point where they realize the menace of the brothel as they do the menace of the saloon. Drink and vice are twin brothers, but abolishing the saloon does not abolish white slavery, the black plague and vice, and these things must be abolished if the race is to endure. Some respectable citizens believe that vice should be segregated, that is officially recognized, and that a certain number of hopelessly diseased and degraded women should be kept apart from the rest of the community, and housed in a certain selected section of the town for the benefit of vicious and depraved men devoid of compassion and decency; that a certain number of women must be sacrificed every year to man's bestiality, in order that the good women of the community may be protected. Out on such a hellish doctrine, say I! It is true that men cannot be made good by act of Congress, nor sobered and made moral by legislation, but there are some things we can do right now and in a practical way to put an end to such brutes as the Botwin fiend, who prey on school girls and who keep the white slave traffic in full swing. Here is what we could do and won't do. Raid every vice den in the country on some Saturday night when business is booming and send all the respectable citizens found in these resorts to prison for ten years, and send the women found in them to the hospital and the reformatory. Send, too, the man who knowingly lets his property for purposes of vice, to the pen for ten years! Send the vampires who run these resorts and traffic in women to prison for life, or better still, send them to the electric chair. Do that as a starter, and you would have ninety per cent of the social evil knocked out of existence in a few weeks. You can handle the black plague end of it as they are doing in New Zealand. You can send the professional seducer to the surgeon's table and the barred cell, and the mothers in the home and the teachers in the schools (and there should be male teachers for boys) should teach a single standard of morals, and wipe out the wicked double standard that now prevails. Teach the boys not only to defend his sister's honor with his life, but the honor of other boys' sisters as well. Even if the white slave den provided a safety valve for the evil impulses of the human animal, nothing could be said to justify its existence, for those who frequent vicious resorts are the most tireless in their pursuit of virtue and chastity and it is they who, when weary of their viciousness marry the daughters of respectable parents, spreading disease unto the third and fourth generation and ruining lives as alcohol never did.

I cannot in this article thrash out this matter in its entirety, but in January I will take the matter up again and show you its "respectable" side. All the evil there is in this world or the worst part of the evil, exists because men and women are such moral cowards and such nasty nice criminal prudes that they seek to hide those things which are gnawing at the very vitals of the social fabric, tearing and rending its very heart, and threatening society with irretrievable and everlasting ruin. Only through publicity can reformation come. Let us face the truth, and if we face the truth in this case we shall rid the world in part at least of its frightful and most terrible menace, the evil which causes not only the death of the body but the death of the soul.

The Christmas season will soon be here and if you haven't a set of Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books your home is not complete and you are not equipped for the full enjoyment of life. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the

Sweet as the Rose are clothes when washed with Fels-Naptha Soap

You will just love to duck your head into a basket of clothes that are washed with Fels-Naptha. The clothes smell clean because they are clean—not only on the surface, but clean through and through. And you don't have to boil them to get them that way. All you need to do is to follow the very simple and easy directions on the red and green wrapper.

Never mind how they did the washing and cleaning before Fels-Naptha was invented. When you once learn how reliably Fels-Naptha will do things for you, you'll be just as enthusiastic as every Fels-Naptha user is today.

blues and the best Christmas gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

GARLAND, TEX.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I guess you are very busy answering so many letters. This is the first time I have ever written to you, but I have read your answers and some of the letters you have received.

I want to ask some important (to me) questions. Where has Mother Goose gone? What do you mean by the "get-rich-quick" scheme? Do you really think the laws would be any better if women were allowed to vote?

Uncle Charlie why don't you put Billy's picture in the COMFORT so we could be acquainted? Billy must be very wise to be able to answer questions that puzzle you. V. A. BRUCE.

Vincent you want to know where Mother Goose has gone to do you? She has gone to sleep under the *goose*berry bush. You ought to try and find her Vincent, as I understand she is laying for you. What do I mean by get-rich-quick schemes? I'm surprised you do not know. The gullible American public is swindled to the tune of three hundred million dollars yearly, by clever, foxy, unprincipled, get-rich-quick schemers. These gentlemen fix up an office with swell furniture, oriental rugs, etc., usually in New York, and then they get up a lurid circular telling about some oil well in California or Mexico (the farther from New York the better) that is spouting out a million dollars' worth of oil a day. Of course they could run the oil well themselves and get richer than Rockefeller in a week or so, but they could not think of being so utterly selfish as that. Their consciences simply would not permit them to keep this gold mine all to themselves. One of them had a dream in which an angel told him that the well would dry up unless they let the dear public in and gave them a chance to share in the profits. So the dear public is allowed to buy stocks in an oil well that never existed and in which every one who invests from a dollar to a thousand dollars expects to become a millionaire within a few weeks. Now that is what is called a get-rich-quick scheme. Anyone who has a few dollars naturally wants to double and treble that money if possible. This is a dollar mad world, and unless you have the price you needn't come around. The only place that the poor man is welcome is the poorhouse and the potter's field. Four per cent in the saving's bank to the average thrifty man looks too slow a way to acquire wealth. He wants ten per cent, fifty per cent, a hundred per cent if he can get it, so the poor idiotic boob takes the savings of years out of the bank, reads once more the seductive get-rich-quick circular about the oil well and the gold mine, or some other fake and sends the savings of a lifetime to the smart Alecs in New York or Chicago, who blow it in as fast as they can get it on chorus girl affinities, champagne suppers in the lobster palaces of Broadway, and luxurious limousines. Later on one of the crazy-get-rich dupes gets suspicious because the dividends forget to come in, and writes to Uncle Sam. Post-office inspectors get on the track of the rascally schemers and off they march them to the Federal prison at Atlanta, Georgia, for five or seven years. That's all there is to get-rich-quick scheming Vincent. You will wonder how these sharks get track of their victims, and know to whom to mail their circulars to. That's easy. In New York there are firms that supply the names of anybody and everybody that ever invested a dollar in any scheme present or future. These are called sucker lists, and they are rightly named. The man who ropes in one batch of easy marks sells their names and addresses to someone else who has a skin game to work and so it goes on. So you see it is all easy Vincent or Victor, whichever your name may be. Do I really think the laws would be better if women were permitted to vote? Unquestionably. If you want to know what women have done in suffrage states and countries to better conditions, the little blue Suffrage Bible will give you some startling information. Men are not anxious to make laws that will help women and children, for there is no more profitable field than the exploitation of women. You will readily understand that what I say is true when I tell you that the regular average wage for women the country o'er is six dollars a week, and even a brass monkey could not live decently on that with food at present high prices. The only thing a politician respects is power. If you have a vote that will put him in office, and another vote that will throw him out, he will break his neck to curry favor with you and get your vote. Politicians who run for office where women vote know they must make laws that protect the interests of women and children and the home or they won't get the women's support. In states where women have no vote, politicians can and generally do ignore questions affecting women entirely. When you've got something other people want and must have, you can decline to give up unless you receive something in return. The politician knows this and so he offers women good laws in exchange for their votes. When they have no votes he offers them—nothing. He simply ignores them and they can't punish him for doing it. In equal suffrage states they can throw that man out of office or see he never gets in. Prejudice, ignorance and self interest are the things that make men keep women away from the ballot box. All the forces of evil, the saloon, the liquor interests, the vice and white slave trusts, the political crooks, the big employers of female labor are all against votes for women and that very fact should alone convince the doubters of the absolute necessity of giving woman a weapon with which to protect herself. The men of England were afraid to let the women vote. They told them to stay home and mind their babies. Now with tears in their eyes they are prostrating themselves before these very women and begging them to come out of their homes and save the nation, and by the eternal it's women that are saving it. War often does in a few weeks what peace cannot accomplish in ages. It is an ill wind, even the blood-stained wind of war, that does not blow somebody good. You will find several lovely pictures of both Billy the Goat and Maria in Uncle Charlie's Picture Book. See notice on first page of this department.

NORTH HAMLET, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am fourteen years old and will be in the sophomore year of high school next year. We have a domestic science and manual training course in our school. Our township is centralized and in the township there are eleven modern wagons to haul the country children to town.

Papa owns the three hundred acre farm we live on. We have thirty cows, ninety sheep, twenty horses, and eighty pigs and hogs. We have a large nine-room house, a big barn, garage and other buildings and silos. We have a 1917 model car. I have a pony named Flip. He and I have very many good times together. I have three brothers and two sisters. All of them are married. I have one niece and one nephew. I do not want to get married until I have a career. I mean to be a domestic science teacher and have a private class in art. I paint china ware and water and oil-paintings. The first money I ever earned was from an oil-painting of a large elm tree in our yard. I got ten dollars for it. I am taking piano lessons. I can play the mandolin and banjo. I am going to learn to play the violin also. Uncle Charlie give me your opinion on "Woman Suffrage." I am going to fight for it. I would not be afraid to prepare a speech on it and speak to a thousand men. I want to be a suffragist leader some day. Ohio would be the best state in the Union if women were allowed to vote. I do not think I would ever want to hold a public office.

Well now my dear Uncle Charlie do not think I do no work because I am an artist and musician. Before we got milking machines I had to milk four cows, twice a day. Now I get three meals a day for father, mother, myself and three hired hands. I wash the dishes, the cream separator and milking machines and keep the kitchen in order. Mother has eight hundred chickens, sixty ducks, two hundred geese, forty guineas and two hundred turkeys. So you see why I have the work to do by myself. We have a hired girl in busy seasons. I get five dollars a week besides my clothes.

Our house, barn, garage, poultry house and corn crib are equipped with electric lights and everything is up-to-date.

I wish the girl cousins living in the cities would visit me every summer and get plenty of fresh air and new milk and eat their fill of fruit. I am so glad I live in the country.

I want to hear from other cousins.

Your niece, RUTH NATALIE ROBERTS.

Ruth, you are certainly one bright, ambitious girl. I wish there were more like you. How I would love to drop down on that farm of yours from an airship and help you shear the cows, milk the sheep, and watch you using the cream separator to separate the pigs from the hogs. Your mother is certainly some poultry expert. The Goat says she ought to send those forty "guineas" over to Italy to fight for their country. Every loyal Eyetalian ought to be on the firing line. You know I don't like the idea of milking cows by machinery, because every now and then I find a piece of machinery in my milk. I believe in the last six months I've swallowed more than three entire milking machines. There was always something so poetic about the dairy-maid, sitting on a one-legged stool, with her head affectionately embedded in Bossy's side, gracefully coaxing the lacteal fluid with her dainty fingers, while the cow patted her lovingly on the cheek every few seconds with a swish of her fly tormentor. Ah that was poetic and ideal and it imparted to the milk an exquisite flavor that it now lacks. I am tickled to bits to note Ruth, that your parents, level headed, sensible souls that they are, pay you five dollars a week for your services. If fathers would make their children business partners in their ventures, there would be more contentment in the home and fewer boys and girls chasing off to the cities to seek their fortunes or rather misfortunes, for it is more of the latter than the former that they find. I'm delighted to know, Ruth, that you have so many accomplishments. It is not every little girl who can be a successful housekeeper, dish pulverizer, cream separator, milking machine chauffeur, and feed six people including three voracious hired men, and make a refractory, revolutionary, disorderly kitchen behave itself without calling in the police, and still have time to be an artist, a musician, a suffrage leader and heaven knows what else. Now that's going some for fourteen. Ruth how you ever get time to spend that V the folks give you is more than I am able to understand. Incidentally too you manage to go to school! The Goat says he can't help you go to school, but if you are too busy to spend that V, he can render you a little assistance. I think you are very wise Ruth, not to want to get married until you have a career. I know a girl who married a career two or three weeks ago, one of those blonde careers about six feet tall. Now she has to take in laundry to support him, while he goes careering around from saloon to saloon. It is always well to size those two-legged careers up before you select one. Not one in six is able or willing to support a girl properly and bring home the bacon regularly every Saturday night without dropping half of it in the saloon en route. I should think as a domestic science teacher Ruth you would be a howling success and have all the necessary ingredients for a first-class career, and I am willing to give you a medal as a past master in the art without your troubling to train in any old domestic science foundry. I had two Goats who were graduates of domestic science schools and they each prepared a meal for me—and the dog enjoyed it very much. Both cases are still in the courts, but I don't suppose I shall ever get enough from either to buy a couple of new stomachs. Ruth I am very much interested in your artistic peculiarities. You say: "I paint china ware and water and oil paintings." Now I can understand the painting of the china ware and I've heard of people watering flowers, watering the stock, watering the lawn, but I never heard of anyone yet who watered paintings. It seems to me too much water would make the paint run, and destroy its artistic appearance. What's that Billy? Ruth means she paints with both water colors and oils. Bully for you Ruth. Take my advice my dear, and confine yourself to water colors for a few years before you tackle oil. Concentrate on one thing. Too many talents are sometimes worse than none. This is the day of concentration and specializing. Art is too vast a field to try to cover it all. Everything seems possible to youth, but not to age. The thing that has excited me most in your letter is where you tell about the first money you earned by your art. You say: "The first money I ever earned was for painting a large elm tree in our yard." Then you add: "I got ten dollars for it." Which dear, the painting or the tree? When I was a boy and painted a tree in our backyard I got a licking for it. I was told I was spoiling the tree and the landscape. You got ten dollars and I got a licking. Ah, me! some people seem to get all the luck in this world. You even have electric light in your chicken coop. Fine idea. The hens will now be able to see where to deposit their eggs without straining their eyes, and when Mr. Rooster comes home late nights he won't break his neck falling upstairs. What a number of instruments you play Ruth. Piano, mandolin, banjo, and now you are going in for the violin. All you need is to add the drum, and then you'll be a complete orchestra. Ruth as I have already given my opinion on woman suffrage many times in the columns of COMFORT, and again in answer to V. A. Bruce's letter in this issue, you'll have to excuse me if I skip the subject this once. Keep on Ruth with your work and your studies, but don't attempt too much. Concentrate on one or two things, and you may be our first woman president. The only time I held office was down in Texas. There was a cyclone that blew the town away, all except the post-office, and that would have gone too if I hadn't got my arms round it. I did not get any thanks however for that heroic act. While I was holding that old wooden post-office several men shouted: "Let 'er go you darned fool, then we can hit up Uncle Sam's pork barrel for a new six million dollar one." I tell you it doesn't pay to be a hero in a land of graft and the man who tries to do a good thing for his country doesn't get half as much appreciation as the man who robs it. It's a tough world. It needs a little more of the paint of righteousness, and if we can get a world full of bright girls like Ruth, of whose artistic ability you have already heard so much, the paint will go on and go on thick.

MELDER, LA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am nineteen years young, am six feet high, weigh one hundred and fifty pounds, have dark brown hair, gray eyes, and inclined to be of dark complexion.

Uncle Charlie, you and I certainly agree on preparing for war as the best means of keeping peace.

I am a farmer boy. I live on a farm of one hundred acres. We raise corn, cotton, peas and potatoes, and we also raise a few peanuts and cane enough to make our syrup. Uncle Charlie, what do you think of boys smoking cigarettes? I don't think it does them any good and I know that it will do them a lot of harm, for I have smoked about two years, but I have quit for it nearly made me blind. I got to where I could hardly see and I quit smoking and my eyes are about well again. But I smoke a pipe. I don't think a pipe will hurt a person as much as a cigarette, although it won't do a fellow any good.

Best wishes to COMFORT and its many readers,
GREENE HILTON.

Greene, I'm glad to know that you have sufficient will power to cut out the cigarettes. The cigarette habit today, not only in this country, but the world over is getting to be as big a curse as opium and rum. Forty years ago the person who smoked cigarettes would draw a crowd. Only one man in a town of three thousand people in which I once resided, smoked cigarettes, and that was a doctor who had been a surgeon in the Turkish army. The next person who introduced cigarettes into that community was myself, about eight or ten years later. People who smoked cigars and pipes those days regarded me with an air of mingled contempt and pity. Now pipes and cigars have almost entirely disappeared and nearly everyone from the baby in the cradle to grandma in the chimney corner has a smoke stick in his or her mouth. Some men and women are going around spending all their days and nights collecting money to purchase cigarettes for the soldiers in the trenches. I know a wireless operator who is on a ship that takes eleven hundred horses to France every month. He tells me that the life of a horse in the warring countries is now from eight to eleven days. It may interest you to know that the life of a soldier after he gets to the front averages twenty-three days. That being the case I can forgive a man who is going to death for smoking out the butt end of his life. If the smoke will soothe his shattered nerves or give him a second's pleasure, then he is welcome to his cigarette. But I can't forgive the scores of thousands of young men and any quantity of women as well, who are trying to smoke away what little they have of health and brain. Heaven knows humanity has enough to contend with, without undermining health, strength, will power and character with cigarette indulgence. Personally I have no objection to a man smoking a cigarette after dinner with his coffee. Two or three cigarettes a day smoked by a healthy person probably would not harm them or anyone else. I'm not one of those cranks who want to abolish everything because there are lots of weak simps who can't indulge in anything without making beasts of themselves. I don't however believe in throwing needless temptation into anyone's way, though a world that is devoid of all temptation is not liable to develop an over abundance of character. Humanity however is still in knee pants, it takes to vice and harmful indulgence as a duck takes to water, and it will shun clean and wholesome living with all the force and energy that a tramp will resist soap. If there were anything twice as fascinating and fifty times as deadly as a cigarette, mankind would go after that and leave the cigarette on the shelf. It is just wonderful how humanity loves to burrow in the mud when it gets a chance. Mankind has awakened to the fact that alcohol and drugs are deadly things, things that threaten to drag the whole race down to destruction. So the world over in all semi-civilized countries (there are no civilized countries as yet) an effort is being made to fight alcohol, opium and its derivatives. In another ten years I predict the ravages of the cigarette habit will have reached such a pitch that the paper smoke will have its place along with rum and dope as one of mankind's greatest enemies, an enemy that must be fought and conquered. It did not take me long to find that even moderate cigarette smoking had a peculiar effect on my heart, so I simply cut the habit out. Today nearly half the world is trying to cook its lungs, sizzle its brains, rot the mucous membrane of its nose and its bronchial tubes, blind its eyes, cancer its lip and tongue, and utterly ruin its nervous system with smoke sticks. You parents don't keep half as careful a watch on your children as you should. As soon as a boy starts to look over your shoulder instead of looking you in the eye, and begins to lie and develop nerves, becomes listless and sports a yellow patch on his fingers, and has a haunted look as though the devil were chasing him, you will know that boy is already a cigarette fiend, and if by this time you parents have not detected the odor of tobacco on his breath and clothes and got wise to the situation you ought to be ashamed of yourselves. Now is the time to use moral suasion, but the cigarette plays such havoc with the boy's nervous system and demoralizes him to such an extent that there is scarcely anything worth while in his make up to appeal to. Before the average parent gets busy, the cigarette has pushed the boy beyond the limits of redemption. In Hoboken, New Jersey, situated across the Hudson from New York, the recorder started a crusade against the cigarette habit. With the assistance of two physicians, four or five hundred boys have been taking the cigarette cure. A hundred and fifty were treated in the police court. The treatment consisted of swabbing the mouth with a solution of nitrate of silver, then a prescription containing gentian root was given by Doctors Joseph Landriggan and Michael Cranioli of the Hoboken Board of Education. While the boys were receiving treatment Mrs. Jennie Hobson Milligan, organizer and lecturer of the New York Anti Cigarette League, lectured the boys. Here are a few of the things she said: "Cigarettes so dim the brain that a boy who smokes them will go from the head of his class to the foot in about six months. Ninety-five boys out of every hundred, who go wrong do so from cigarette smoking and I know what I am talking about. Tobacco is the second deadliest poison we know of. One cigarette is more harmful than two ounces of crude whiskey. Lying and stealing, which go hand in hand, are among the first habits that the cigarette smoking boy tries. If you want to be honest and good citizens, don't smoke cigarettes. Statistics show that the average life of a cigarette smoker is thirty years. A boy who smoked cigarettes and who recently died from them was found to have one lung entirely black when an autopsy was performed on him." Now boys and a lot of you girls who are acquiring the cigarette habit take warning. Cigarettes will make healthy boys into physical and moral cripples. School teachers watch your pupils. You must be blind indeed if you cannot detect a cigarette fiend. Report these cases to the parents, and start an anti-cigarette league among your scholars. People little realize to what an appalling extent the cigarette habit is undermining the health and morals of the youth of our land. Our newspapers and magazines are smothered with huge, gaudy advertisements of various brands of cigarettes. These ads should receive the same treatment given to whiskey advertisements they should be prohibited. Now get busy and do your best to overcome and wipe out this habit and this menace, before it has wiped out some of those near and dear to you.

RAINBOW, CAL.

DEAR UNCLE:

I read COMFORT and think it a fine paper. I was very much interested in reading the account of your day's work. You are surely doing a great work for one and all. Now Uncle I want to know if it is so necessary to live under sanitary conditions, why so many people can and do live seemingly healthy and happy lives under quite different conditions. Here is one of those happy persons. He goes to the doctor to find the cause of the scaly appearance of his arms. The doctor said: "How long has it been since you have taken a bath?" "Well, I guess about fifteen years." I hear if Methuselah had been provided with a sleeping porch he would have been alive today. And here is a man who gives us a new treatment. He goes to bed in the fall and stays there until spring for his health. D. WICKERSHAM.

Now friend Wickersham, I don't know whether you are a lady or a gentleman or otherwise. Never leave your sex in doubt even if you have to grow whiskers to prove you are not a lady. Yes, Daniel or Dinah, as the case may be, it does seem strange that some people can live and apparently be perfectly healthy and happy, though the environment they exist in is laden with filth and the filth inhabited by billions of germs.

Uncle Charlie's Birthday Fund

COMFORT Readers Plan Substantial Recognition of Uncle Charlie's Great Service to Humanity

ON September 25 last, Uncle Charlie celebrated his fifty-third birthday and on February 3rd next, he will celebrate two more momentous events, his twentieth year of bedridden invalidism, and the fourteenth year of his connection with COMFORT. Numbers of our readers have resolved that these momentous epochs in the life of one who has so fearlessly battled for right and righteousness, and who has acted the part of the good Samaritan to so many afflicted souls, should now in his declining years—before his increasing infirmities have rendered further active service on his part impossible, and his able pen is laid aside forever—receive in a substantial way some lasting and tangible token of love and gratitude from the millions he has inspired by his patience, heroism and devotion to the cause of the lowly and oppressed.

Already this inspiring plan, which originated with our subscribers, has taken definite shape, and it only needs the combined efforts of his many friends and admirers among the COMFORT reading family to place Uncle Charlie forever beyond the relentless hand of want and worry. And it is none too soon to begin now, before Uncle Charlie's ailments have rendered him not only incapable of work but too prostrate and helpless to appreciate and enjoy those many things our myriad hands and hearts could so readily and with so little effort and sacrifice, place within his reach.

COMFORT has rightly decided that this whole matter of providing a home for Uncle Charlie, or better still, placing at his disposal a fund which could be used by him to lift the many burdens which necessarily press so heavily upon all who are sick and who must rely on others for the slightest service, should rest entirely with COMFORT'S readers. They started it, they are promoting it, and while it might be indelicate for COMFORT to boost the movement, the least it can do is to give it due publicity at the special request of its readers.

This project should be a spontaneous outpouring on the part of the whole COMFORT family and especially of the children and the young people who have profited so much by Uncle Charlie's splendid work. One of our subscribers writes: "The world has heaped its tens of thousands of dollars upon healthy, husky, Billy Sunday for preaching heaven beyond the grave. Shall Uncle Charlie lying prostrate on his little cot preaching a far more beautiful and helpful religion (heaven here as well as heaven beyond), receive no recognition, and pass into the shadows as nearly all the greatest of the world's heroes and teachers have, without recognition or reward?"

Just how far this project has been carried along the road to success will be seen by the following letter from Uncle Charlie, dated October 1st.

"Dear Friends: I want to express my heartfelt thanks to the big-hearted, generous souls who made my fifty-third birthday one of the very happiest events of my life. The sum received from two hundred contributors through subscriptions and donations amount to $230. A personal note of thanks has been sent to all who contributed. Together with the gifts came many heart-touching, beautiful letters that affected me deeply. It was very dear and sweet of so many of you to remember me and your kindness is the more appreciated from the fact, that owing to the terrific high cost of living and the tremendous increase in the price of paper and everything that goes into book making (an increase in some cases of over a hundred per cent), my income has been cut to a point where existence becomes an acute problem. In the mad rush for pleasure and excitement people are reading less and thinking less and magazines and books alas! are being discarded for joy rides and movies. But the swing of the pendulum will bring people back to their senses again. I love humanity and have every faith in it. Again I want to thank those dear souls who seem to think I should be rewarded for merely doing my duty. I deeply and profoundly appreciate the project they have set on foot to relieve me of a few of my crushing cares and responsibilities. Perhaps it would not be out of place to say that those who wish to send sunshine into my life, and who wish to be helpful instead of merely sympathetic, can best do so by placing one or more of the Uncle Charlie books in their homes and the homes of their friends. If fifty thousand of our readers would include these books in their Christmas giving (and COMFORT is utterly unselfish as it gives all a chance to either work for or purchase them), I should not only be the proud possessor of a COMFORT home, but there would be enough left over to relieve me of financial worry for years to come. Once more I send my thanks, gratitude and love to the entire COMFORT family and especially to those dear souls who have so generously sought to minister to my needs and are planning to make less thorny my pathway in the future. God bless you all.

Ever lovingly, UNCLE CHARLIE.

Only two hundred out of six millions! ! That does not look very promising, but Christmas is near and the spirit of the Christ will doubtless unlock the doors of a million hearts and there is no better or fitter way by which we can celebrate the birthday of the Christ Child than by making bright and glorious the Christmas of one who has for many years in these columns sent broadcast the divine message: "Peace on Earth, Good Will to Men," to every corner of our great land. Here is how the project can be accomplished:

1. By cash donations.

2. By purchasing Uncle Charlie's books (see advertisement).

3. Those who cannot spare the money for a cash donation or for purchase of his books can contribute by getting subscriptions to COMFORT in aid of the "Uncle Charlie Benefit Fund" and instead of taking the club premium or cash commission themselves direct that it be credited to the fund. In such cases I will pay over to Uncle Charlie one half of the subscription price of all subscriptions sent for this purpose. The regular cash commission on COMFORT subscriptions is 40 per cent, but for Uncle Charlie's Benefit Fund I will allow 50 per cent. Another way to help him and benefit yourself is to get up a subscription club and take one of his books as your premium.

In one or other of these ways every COMFORT reader who wishes to do so can help swell the fund for Uncle Charlie which has my hearty approval and will have my assistance within the limits of propriety.

House Plants for Winter

By Elizabeth Atwood

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

FLOWERS for shut-ins should have two virtues—beauty and adaptability for indoor growing.

Flowers that grow in the house only through constant care and effort, and that even then frequently droop and die or grow scaggly and refuse to bloom, should be avoided; first of all because many a shut-in seems to see her own life reflected in the flowers. I have known such unfortunates who actually became worse and believed they were going to die because some plant they cherished would not grow or bloom and finally withered and had to be removed.

First select such flowers as give brilliancy, not too heavy an odor and have attractive foliage as well as blossoms. Too many flowers are not advisable in one room. Too many flowers seem to detract one from the other and do not give the pleasure that comes from a few well-chosen varieties.

Geraniums are always delightful in the house. They are ideal for shut-ins because with proper care one can keep them nearly always in bloom and there is something bright, cheerful and at the same time soothing about the foliage as well as the blossom.

Others best suited for the house include the primrose, cyclamen, flowering maple and the lobster cactus (called "crab" cactus by some.)

Several primrose plants should be used, as they bloom about six months with good care and then rest six months. By using several plants, some started to bloom in the spring and others started to bloom in the fall, you will have primrose blossoms throughout nearly all of the year. They stand heat very well and should be given all the sunshine possible. No plants should be too close to a radiator or register. The flowers are borne in clusters on stems four or five inches high and are tinged with blue or rose. The foliage is heavy and attractive, making this plant a genuine delight. Some people find the hairs on the leaves irritating to the skin, but this trouble is not general and otherwise the primrose known as "primula obconica," is unsurpassed as a plant for the window. There are other primroses which are worth growing, although they do not bloom so freely. Kewensis, which is one of them, has small yellow flowers on the top of tall stems carrying several leaves.

Some of the begonias flower almost as freely as the primroses and the fibrous varieties are very easy to grow. The foliage is green in some varieties and variegated in others, but always having a curious waxy appearance, except the "beef-steak" sort. They are grown for their foliage, which is decidedly ornamental, being dark green on top and a rich red underneath. The leaves often measure eight inches across. They grow well in a north room where they get no sun, although they will bear flowers of higher color when exposed to the sun's stimulating rays. The varieties of begonia run into the thousands. Probably the class known as "semperflorens" is the best for the house. The variety listed as "gigantea rosea" is especially satisfactory, as it will bloom without ceasing for the greater part of the year. The flowers range from white through all shades of pink and scarlet.

The cyclamen is as fine as most of the orchids and the flowers are unsurpassed for cutting. It is no trouble to keep fresh cyclamen blooms for a week or ten days in a vase of water and few flowers are more acceptable to "shut-ins," partly because of their rare beauty and partly because they are so seldom seen. The cyclamen plants should be kept in a fairly cool room or else close to the window, where there is usually cool, fresh air. The plants are started from seed, but a little bulb is formed before the plant grows above ground. The top of the bulb should be even with the surface of the soil. It will gradually work higher as the plant develops. Do not throw away the plants when they have finished blooming. There is no reason why they should not be kept and made to flower again. When the blooming period is over, the plant should be set out of doors in a cool and shady spot where it can rest and recuperate. It must not be allowed to dry out and when growth starts afresh, it is best shifted to a pot one inch larger than the one in which it has been grown. For a few days it should be kept out of the sun, in order that it may become well started, after which it may be set in the window again. With such treatment a plant may be made to bloom several years, but it is well to buy at least one new specimen each season.

Geraniums need a cool situation and a moist atmosphere, yet often thrive under conditions which seem all but impossible. They will flourish especially well in a kitchen where there is plenty of steam. Dry heat is objectionable, but they cannot have too much sunlight.

Never discard a geranium just because it has passed its youth. If well cared for, it will flourish and flower for years. The main thing is to keep it cut back and well nourished. There is no reason for repotting them, except at long intervals. It is much better to remove an inch or more of the surface soil each fall and replace it with very rich earth or with compost from the garden or the florist's.

LOBSTER OR CRAB CACTUS.

The flowering maple is a small shrub with odd, bell-shaped flowers and is generous with its blossoms, remaining in flower many months if the plant is a strong one. The flowers differ in color according to the variety. Boule de Neige, "ball of snow," is pure white, "Thompsoni" has double flowers of orange striped with crimson, "Golden Fleece" is pure yellow. Plants cost but a few cents and are easily increased by cuttings. They must be kept cut back for they shoot up rapidly. While they are in blossom they require much water and the drainage must be perfect. After they cease flowering, they should be given just enough water to prevent their drying up.

The crab or lobster cactus is a splendid indoor decorative plant. A good young one will have a profusion of bright red blossoms much of the season. The stems resemble the claws of a crab and a pair of gorgeous red flowers grow at the edge of each tip. The plants may be grown in hanging pots for a brilliant display.

Flowering bulbs are splendid for shut-ins. Select tulips, hyacinths, narcissi, the common Chinese lily, and freesias. These are easy to grow and yield a bountiful supply of the exquisite blossoms. Freesias should be started in a cool room, that is well lighted. Chinese lilies are best grown in a bowl or shallow dish filled with water, pebbles being used to keep the bulbs in place. Keep the buds from being blighted by extreme heat or draughts of cold air.

The paper white narcissus may be grown in the same way as the Chinese lily bulb. Hyacinths are also grown in water, but usually in glasses made especially for the purpose and so arranged at the neck that the bulbs are held in position at the top of the glass. The water should just touch the bottom of the bulb and it is well to keep a little charcoal in the water to sweeten it. If the water evaporates, more must be added, although without disturbing the bulb. The glass with its bulb should be set in a cool, dark place until the bottom of the glass is filled with roots.

Wide, shallow pots are better for bulbs than any other kind and the tops of the bulbs should be set just under the soil or barely protruding. It is a mistake to fill the pots; half an inch should be left so that when water is applied it will not run off but will have time to soak in.

All these plants will thrive in soil from a well-fertilized garden. In most cases it will help to work in a little leaf mold and pulverized sheep manure, but as you are to grow only a limited number of plants, you can do no better than to buy a little potting soil at the store of some florist. It will cost only a few cents and you can be sure that it contains what your plants need for good, strong growth.

GERANIUM.

When plants grow rapidly and throw out hosts of blossoms, heavy drain is made on the plant food in the soil and it is well to replace some of it. There is no better fertilizer for house plants than liquid manure. It is easily made by placing a few cents' worth of pulverized sheep manure from the seed store in a bucket in an out-of-the-way place and allowing water to stand on it. When used, it must be diluted to the color of very weak tea. This feeding will help to give large flowers of good color. These fertilizers must not be used too freely, or the plants will be over-stimulated and will rebel. To a large extent the coloring of flowers depends upon the amount of sunlight they receive. Begonias for example carry much brighter, richer hues when they are grown in sunny windows than if kept in partial shade.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

children far surpasses the care they are when they are small. And how quickly they grow up, indeed, all too soon. One of the saddest sights I know of is an old couple with no children to love and care for them in their old age. So take my advice, dear ones, and don't injure your health so that you will not live out your days. I think there is no better sight this side of Heaven than a kind and loving old couple with a nice family of girls and boys who have been brought up to be a blessing and an honor to them and a comfort in their old age.

I do hope and pray for Mattie Fugitt's recovery, that she may be spared to her children.

I enjoyed Mrs. Reynold's letter, from among the chimney tops, very much and wish she could step in and enjoy the country life with me. I often wonder why people stay so crowded in the large cities when there is so much room and some to spare in the country and where one can raise nearly all they eat and enjoy God's great outdoors.

Can you give me Hebert Kaufman's address?

With all good wishes for our dear COMFORT and its readers.

HAPPY MOTHER.

Happy Mother. As much as I admire Herbert Kaufman's writings I am unable to give you his address. Perhaps some of the readers can tell us. —Ed.

PADUCAH, 1740 Clay St., KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you make room for a Kentucky sister? I have been benefited so much by the helpful recipes and letters that I want to add my mite. To any of the sisters sending self-addressed, stamped envelope I will send pattern and directions for making nursery quilt, "Sunbonnet Baby," which is all the rage here. Will send picture of block and you can use all kinds of scraps.

Well, sisters, on divorce, I think there are always two sides to a case, as the lawyers say. I, for one, don't think it right, but if a man abuses his wife—well, they started wrong in the beginning. She never should have allowed such a thing. I have been married twenty-seven years and know what I am talking about.

Cordially yours, MRS. H. S. THIXTON.

Mrs. Thixton. The "Sunbonnet Baby" quilts are very pretty, but I hope you are prepared to supply quite a demand. It is one thing to expect a few replies and to get fifty or a hundred, if not more, as has been the experience of more than one sister. Anyway, all send stamped envelopes and that will help some. Working on the theory that "men are but children of a larger growth" evidently you believe in early training, of husbands, but won't you tell some of the young wives how to begin. Do you believe in these married-fifty-years-and never quarrelled people, or are they too good, to be true? If there are any, won't they tell us how they did it—and we'll be satisfied with an account of even five or ten years.—Ed.

ARAPAHO, OKLA.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

May I come in a little while? I will make my letter as brief as possible and tell what I came for.

My home is just outside the corporation of Arapaho the county seat of Custer county, overlooking the business part of the town, and four miles south of here is Clinton, a very hustling "little city" and the best town in this part of Oklahoma. I dearly love my little home, the only one I have known since I lost my mother some years ago, back in an Eastern state, but my husband is failing in health so we, with our twenty months old daughter, are obliged to seek another home in a different state. We want a country home in eastern Colorado, south of the river and not too far east of the mountains, outside the irrigation district where there is grazing for cows and a market for poultry and dairy products.

If any of the sisters know of property in that line I would like to correspond. We will sell or exchange our property here where we live and also some property in town.

There are so many subjects open for discussion that I hardly know which needs the most attention but will say a few words on marriage and home life. When I was but a young girl I determined never to get married until I could make up my mind to take upon myself the cares of motherhood. I was twenty-eight years old when I married. It is wrong to bring little ones into the world if we cannot care for them but if we do our part, God will give us the needed strength for what can the human family find to take the place of little ones, upon which to bestow our love and affection.

I am in favor of women voting.

Success to all, MRS. ELI YODER.

RAIRDEN, WYO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I'm only a young wife, twenty-two years old, clamoring for a chance to become acquainted with you. I've never written before but I want to thank you and our kind editor for the cheery letters. I'm happily married to one of the best of husbands and we have a sweet baby boy, nine months old, who is such a blessing to us.

We've been in this part of the United States only a few months (came from southwest Oklahoma) and at times we get lonely, as we have but few neighbors and no relatives or close friends nearer than Iowa and Oklahoma, so we depend on each other, our baby and our books and papers for "company" and I assure you I derive a great deal of pleasure from the Sisters' Corner in COMFORT.

I'm very much interested in the discussion of the different topics and hardly know just which to choose as the most helpful. I like the descriptions of the different parts of our country. It's like a very interesting geography lesson. Then, too, such questions as Woman Suffrage, child rearing, the divorce question and all others, have their charm for me.

Who says women can't think on serious questions? Just let him read the Sisters' Corner and he will find a clear, concise, logical way of treating all topics worth while, and done as good as the men could do it, too.

I would like to say a few words in regard to our so-called "Mexican Problem." I believe it is nothing more or less than the attempt of capitalists of this and other countries who—with the help of Diaz, took Mexico from the people—to utterly crush the revolution and force those poor Mexican people back into peonage. We have facts to prove that ninety-one per cent of the mining enterprises in Mexico are controlled by the Americans, British, French, German and Dutch and the remaining nine per cent are divided with Spain and the South American countries, and in everything else they have been treated unfairly and denied every right. Is it any wonder they eye Uncle Sam with suspicion, or that the capitalists would like to force interventions by inciting bandit raids?

It surely seems that our country is fast becoming militaristic. Now, don't anyone tell me that Congress is in favor of National Defense and that their program has that end in view, only, because the Congressional Record for July plainly states that the Senate overwhelmingly declared the Navy was for offense and not defense. I believe in preparedness just so far that it is for defense and there I stop. I can't understand why, after all these years of peace, our shores aren't sufficiently protected, since sixty cents of every dollar Uncle Sam gets goes for war purposes—or is supposed to. Will some one enlighten me as to why conditions are such?

I'm enough interested in politics that I'd like to see everybody getting a square deal in this land of plenty and because women have to work for their living I believe they should have the vote. Only one national platform this year demands the adoption of the "Susan B. Anthony amendment" to the Federal constitution which would give all women the vote at once and if I could I'd vote for that party which recognizes women's rights—the Socialist party.

I also take a great interest in housekeeping, care of baby, crocheting and am learning how to care for and raise house plants. I love flowers but the only ones we can have here must be raised in pots. We live on the Big Horn Basin about 100 miles southeast of the Yellowstone Park, on an eighty-acre, irrigated farm. The principal crops are Alfalfa, beets, beans and potatoes.

Would be glad to hear from anyone and will answer if stamped envelope is enclosed.

Good luck to all, MRS. MARK C. JONES.

STRUM, WISCONSIN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for a number of years and have enjoyed its pages from first to last. I don't know which part I like best for I find a part for every mood.

I am a busy farmer's wife with poor health and a family of three girls and three boys so you see I can find use for much reading and on many subjects from housekeeping, church work and rearing a family on down to fancy work and mending for the dear ones. I am a young woman, only thirty-seven now, and when I first became "tied" (?) down to my little family it seemed very hard to do the homely tasks we all find to do around the home. But I always did them for the love of the babies and my husband in this way,—when the dishes needed to be washed and I "just hated" to do it I said to myself, "What if this were the last time I could wash the little plates?" and in an instant the task became a pleasure. Now I have two big girls, eighteen and nineteen years old, and more loving girls would be hard to find and they are always faithful to return the love that I have bestowed upon them. I have never lied to them in any way and am rewarded by having them perfectly truthful with me.

Will the sister who gave a remedy for head lice, four or five years ago, please repeat it in COMFORT or, better still, send it direct to me. It was a bitter bark, steeped and used as a tea. It was also a very good tonic for the scalp.

Hoping this letter will be a help to some tired mother, I remain, A friend to COMFORT's staff of workers and all the sisters.

MRS. G. M. HEADLEY.

Mrs. Headley. If more mothers could follow your example the homely, everyday tasks would become glorified and take on a greater meaning for as a labor of love they would be less tiresome than if thought of as mere drudgery. If we knew that our children were to be taken away from us because caring for them was such a task, straightway it would become a pleasure and we would be unable to do enough for their comfort. And the same holds true of all other members of the family as well.—Ed.

MARION, ALA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a subscriber to COMFORT ever since I married and we all love it. I missed my July issue and would be glad if some sister would send me one. Will pay postage on same.

I have been married eleven years and have four boys and one little girl, six months old, who is the light of our home. Also have two baby boys gone on home. I like to read the letters regarding the training of children, for we certainly have many problems to face. I have one that I do not know how to manage. He is so contrary, at times he will do anything he thinks I do not want him to. He will stand in the hot sun because he knows I want him to stay in the shade. The only way, or rather the easiest way, I have found is not to pay any attention to him. He is only two years old yet and I hope he will outgrow it.

How many of the sisters have ever made little suspenders for their babies' napkins? I make them like men's suspenders except that I do not cross them in the back. Have two straps to go over the shoulders and sewed to a square or oblong piece of cloth, front and back, then sew a little strip to fasten to napkin, front and back. Put a strip of elastic, if desired, in strips over shoulders. This slips on over the head and is a great convenience.

I do not feed my babies till they are old enough to eat and I do not use "any old rag" to wash baby with. She has a clean washcloth and a separate basin from the grownups.

My baby is unusually healthy as are my older children.

We have had a hard struggle the last few years to make both ends meet. Our house and contents were burned four years ago and now the boll weevil gets all the cotton and the floods of July did a great deal of damage, but not so much here as along the rivers for people there lost their houses as well as their crops. The towns fed some of the destitute people. I feel that we have something to be thankful for.

I see some are writing about large families. Of course we all know that two children can have more advantages than several. I think that children of a large family have more self denial and are more independent than those from a small family.

I have a sister, Mrs. George Brewster, living at Millville, Florida. If anyone living near her sees this please show it to her, as she does not take COMFORT.

Your sister, MRS. FLOYD F. TUBB.

PARADIS, LA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I am an old reader of COMFORT and could not do without the dear old paper. It was the first paper I can remember reading when I was but a little tot.

I have been married less than two years to one of the best of husbands and we are very happy indeed. I think a great many cases of divorce could be avoided if every married couple would try and study each other's disposition and cultivate a habit of pleasing each other instead of trying to find something to quarrel about. I wish the sisters would give their views on t' matter. Let's discuss it and bring it before the readers of COMFORT. It might help many couples who are always finding fault with each other.

I live in God's country where we can grow something for the table all the year around. Our land produces fine vegetables on account of the richness of the soil. We can grow anything that will grow in a temperate zone and we don't have to build expensive barns or silos as our winters are mild and we can grow green feed during the winter. Our summers are long but not excessively hot as we always have a breeze, due to our close proximity to the Gulf.

Enquirers are reminded to send stamp for reply.

MRS. FRED PITTE.

———, CALIFORNIA.

DEAR "STEPPY" AND ALL COMFORT SISTERS:

After I read "Steppy's" letter in July COMFORT I sat down and wept for did I not have almost the same experience except with an adopted child instead of a stepchild. I love children but expect to be obeyed. I sacrificed, as did "Steppy" and my reward was disobedience and sullen looks. I gave all the love of my starving heart to the little girl. I was a widow of twenty-two when I adopted her. She slept every night in my arms but tore my heart by day. She had relatives, who appeared jealous and unsympathetic of my struggles with her naughtiness, who seemed to urge her to be naughty. I then married a dear boy and he was certainly wise. He saw how things were and talked seriously to me. He advised me to send her into the lion's mouth, in other words to her relatives, for a visit. I emphatically refused at first for I feared they would turn her against me. Finally I sent her, just before the Christmas holidays. I wrote her only three letters and she was there six months, though I could hardly endure it and as it turned out, neither could she. The uncle and aunt had children also. The first week was ideal, then where the little girl had been first she became last. Her wishes were disregarded and she was sneered at and ridiculed.

Making Pork Without Corn

THE high price of meat means that meat is scarce. The supply is not increasing. Population is. Meat will therefore continue to be high. The cheapest form of meat to produce is pork. With present prices prevailing there is "money in pork."

One of the highest priced meat articles on the market is bacon. Bacon is preferred to other forms of pork because—it keeps well, is of good flavor and is not so fat as salt pork. That is, lean bacon is preferred.

Good bacon is produced from young pigs not too fat—but the best bacon comes from the bacon type of hog.

Bacon Hogs

To make the largest amount of bacon the hog must have a deep, broad side. This must be well muscled and must not be too fat. The Yorkshire and the Tamworth are the favorite bacon breeds. These breeds have a much higher proportion of fat to lean than the so-called "lard hog."

While breed is a factor in the production of bacon, feed is of even greater importance. Hogs are produced chiefly in the corn belt. Corn is, therefore, their principal feed. Corn makes fat pork not desirable for bacon. Since hogs and corn go together, it is assumed that hogs cannot be grown with profit without corn. This may have been true in the past but with present prices prevailing it is no longer true. Besides the best of bacon is produced without corn.

Feeding for Bacon

About this time of the year spring pigs that have been reared on milk and pasture weigh from 100 to 150 pounds. These, if finished on corn, make "lard" hogs. But if finished without corn will produce the choicest of bacon. Here are a few good rations:

In potato sections the cull potatoes may be cooked and mixed with milk, bran and shorts and fed abundantly, all the pigs will eat up clean. A little dry barley may be added to this ration. When peas are grown, field peas, fed dry in trough, will be found to supplement the slop feed. In general, to produce good bacon, feed a slop feed composed of milk and some good ground grain feed like shorts, oats and barley ground together, or ground peas, or boiled potatoes and shorts. To this add a dry grain like peas or barley, fed sparingly in the trough after the other feed is cleaned up. If the pigs' teeth get sore, feed all grain ground in the slop.

The above feeds make a lean pork and lean pork produces the best of bacon.

Good pork can be made without corn—in fact the best bacon cannot be made from corn.

Feeding Roots

There are a few important things which should be remembered relative to the feeding of roots. This form of feed is expensive, in that roots contain great quantities of water. One pound of dry matter in roots is practically equal to one pound of dry matter in grain, for feeding purposes, but roots contain eighty per cent or more of water. Experiments have shown that it requires 400 to 425 pounds of potatoes to equal 100 pounds of corn-meal in the fattening of pigs. Potatoes should be cooked for swine. In Ireland cooked potatoes and barley meal are popular for the final fattening of pigs, and in some parts of Great Britain such hogs are finished off on whole peas, to give the hams a fine flavor. In feeding cooked potatoes they are mashed and the meal sprinkled on them in that state. For the feeding of cows and sheep raw potatoes should be sliced, but we have never seen any great advantage in this root (really a tuber or under-ground stem) in the keeping or fattening of cattle or sheep. Fed in large quantities to cows raw potatoes tend to make the butter soft and salvy. They are apt to choke cows, unless sliced. Raw potatoes are of little value in the feeding of horses, but they are quite useful in ridding these animals of worms. For that purpose the potatoes should be fed in small quantities, watching the bowels, and increased gradually. Fed too liberally at first they produce scouring. They are particularly useful for young colts, infested with worms. Carrots are the best roots for horse feeding. They have a fine effect upon the skin and kidneys. If fed in quantity they produce scouring. They should be wiped clean at feeding time, but need not be washed, as they are produced in light friable soil, which usually does not tend to cling to the roots. Parsnips, not commonly used, are excellent feed for the horse, being more nutritious than the carrot and almost as palatable. Some horses will not eat carrots, and then should be offered parsnips. These roots are fed freely to dairy cows in the islands of Guernsey and Jersey. There is a special variety on the market for stock feeding. Rutabagas, called Swede turnips, or Aberdeen Purple Tops in Scotland are the staple feed of cattle and sheep in many parts of Great Britain. In Scotland the farmers allow five tons of these roots per cow, for winter feeding and young, growing "store" cattle are wintered on roots and oat straw. For fattening cattle the roots are simply cut in four parts, by pounding with an x shaped knife. For sheep, and often for cow feeding, the turnips (for they are turnips) are sliced into fingers, by a special machine, or another form of machine slices them for all stock. In cow feeding the roots often are pulped by machinery and spread on oat straw, layer by layer, or they are steamed along with cut straw, cut hay, grain and meals. It is best to feed raw turnips just after milking, else they will taint the milk. Cattle eat 50 pounds or more a day. In Scotland, where some 8,000,000 sheep are kept, Swede turnips are eaten off the ground until only shells are left; then the shells are lifted with a pick and eaten in due course. Oats, bran and oilcake, with oat straw and hay, are also fed. Rutabagas are relished by horses, but care must be taken to cut them up, to prevent choking. Two or three a day are sufficient. Sugar beets are sometimes fed, but the large proportion of sugar tends to cause scouring. Mangels are better, but contain more water and there is the further disadvantage in feeding these roofs that they tend to cause gravel and stone in the bladder, in sheep and also in cattle. This only occurs when fat animals are given mangels in large quantities daily for a long time. They are fed late in the season, the rutabagas being fed off first. Mangels are easier and less expensive than sugar beets to cultivate, as they grow higher out of the ground and their immense production lessens the disadvantage of their large content of water. Fed as a part ration to fattening hogs they regulate the bowels and improve the pork. Beets and mangels are fine for pregnant sow feeding. Combined with good alfalfa hay they will serve as a complete winter ration and sows so fed have strong pigs and little if any trouble at farrowing time. Roots should be grown, to a limited extent, on every farm where such crops can be produced to advantage, especially so in northern and wet districts, but root houses have to be provided for their keeping and that tends to make them unpopular with men of small means and the extra work necessary to keep the crops clean, also is a disadvantage. There is no finer beef anywhere than that raised in Great Britain where roots form a large part of the ration.

Woful Waste of Feed

The daily papers and certain ill-informed calamity howlers are spilling ink profusely advising people to save the calves, feed the calves, relieve the tension in regard to meat supply, make cheaper meat, help the poor city man to live more cheaply, make meat possible on every table. This is all very well in some respects and wrong in others. It is a shame when really good calves are butchered too young, ill-fed, unfinished for veal. It is wrong practise to slaughter dairy heifer calves, if they have come from deep producing cows and pure bred sires. It is right to slaughter thousands of calves that are not worth raising. The trouble is not actually in the slaughter of calves worth feeding for human consumption. The fault is in the production of runt calves of mongrel and scrub breeding that no man can afford to feed or raise. The country is full of such worthless stuff. On the big farms of the plains one can see hundred of such calves. They were sired by nondescript bulls and the owners have too little feed to make them into cheap beef. No wonder they flood the market with such calves. The same thing holds true of many men in the dairy business. All they want is to have fresh cows for milk production. They do not raise the calves. The calves born on their farms are not worth raising and so they go to the city by the carload and make sorry veal at that. Then there is the man who is in still worse plight. He is the fellow who uses a scrub or grade bull and feeds the progeny with the hope that the females will make good dairy cows and the steers good beef animals. Such hopes are absurd, such work futile. The only way of getting calves that are worth raising for dairying, or fattening for beef, is by the use of pure bred bulls of dairy and beef breeds. It also is well to know that the dams of the calves are fine milk producing cows. One should breed for performance from known performers. The same rule and logic obtain as regards beef cattle. It is sinful waste of good feed to put it into scrub stock. Let each reader ask himself if he is doing that kind of ruinous feeding.

Make the Gains Early

It should ever be borne in mind that the profit in the feeding of all animals is largest from the early put on gain or weight. If the foal, calf, pig or lamb milk flesh is lost it may never be perfectly regained and it always is an expensive matter to start growth in stunted young animals. The weight that is gained by steady growth is the least expensive to acquire and after the natural growth of the body has ceased the extra weight is put on at much expense and often does not prove profitable. It should be the aim of every feeder of animals for the market to keep his young animals growing just as fast as possible, without causing sickness from overfeeding. A draft colt acquires at least one half of his adult weight during the first year of his life, if he is properly fed, but if he is partially starved, so that he weighs too little at one year old he may never grow to his full stature, weight or strength, no matter how much feed is supplied. Grow the colt to his maximum weight and size during the first year. It pays to feed him to do this. So too with the feeding steer, pig and lamb. None of these animals is a one food beast; yet many a farmer forgets that and thinks that an ample supply of any one good feed is sufficient. Timothy hay is a good feed, so is bright oat straw, so is corn; but the growing animal needs a mixture of feeds and cannot perfectly thrive on a one food diet. Sell some of the feed that is superabundant and buy other feeds to balance the ration, or better still try to grow a variety of feeds for all of the animals upon the farm. As an illustration of the kind of feed mixture needed for a young pig we may state that the Wisconsin experiment station people give their young growing pigs a mixture of 32 pounds each of corn-meal, wheat middlings and ground oats and four pounds of oilmeal in the form of thick slop made up with hot water. The oilmeal makes a sticky mixture, the meals of which do not settle to the bottom of the trough at feeding time. Ear corn may be added as the pigs attain good weights and come to the fattening time of life. Other suitable rations are: 47 pounds each of corn-meal and wheat middlings, six pounds oilmeal; or 32 pounds each of ground barley, wheat middlings, ground oats and four pounds oilmeal; or 47 pounds each of wheat middlings and ground barley and six pounds of oilmeal.

Things Learned Last Season

On Riverholm farm we did not again seed land to winter rye and winter vetch. Last year these crops grew well, but the cows did not relish the combination at the time such feed was most needed. Green grass is most appreciated by dairy cows and when the pasture becomes bare, short and dry an adjunct feed to be appreciated must be succulent, like grass. By the time grass is drying rye and vetch are too ripe and coarse to be well relished. At first the cows will lick out the vetch, then they will eat some rye heads, but soon they do not care for the mixture. The same is true of winter wheat and vetch. These are relished when quite short and green but at that stage of growth grass is plentiful. Rye and vetch, however, make a capital growth and furnish a valuable green crop for turning under as manure; or the crop may be allowed to ripen and the vetch will then furnish ripe seed to put in again, as a mixture, with rye. We have some of this combination stacked and will use it in the scratching shed for the chickens this winter, instead of threshing. Where one has but a small acreage in various grains and oats is the chief grain it seldom pays to change the thresher parts to thresh each sort of grain in turn. It seems best to thresh the oats and use the lesser grain crops in the bundle.

A combination of peas and oats is far preferable to rye and vetch for soiling cows in summer. The rye and vetch of course have the advantage in that they are seeded in fall, cover the ground through the winter and come away quickly in spring, but the cows greatly prefer oats and peas and gain in milk flow when such feed can be generously supplied. One bushel each of oats and Canada or field pea are sown just as soon as the ground can be worked in spring and has become warm enough to seed. The seed may be drilled in or put in with a broadcasting seeder. The land should be very rich and in fine tilth. The crop will then be ready for use in the latter part of July and beginning of August, just when it is most required. After the oats and peas have been used the corn fodder comes in season and is relished, but it does not induce milk flow so well as the other combination.

Early sweet corn may be seeded first to give an early cut of green feed for the cows. Then flint corn comes in and then ordinary field corn. It is not well to plant the field corn very thickly for fodder purposes. The sweet corn and flint may be broadcasted or thickly drilled, but the late planted field corn for fall cutting should make lots of good ears and so should be drilled not closer than nine inches apart and some prefer ten to fourteen. Our silage corn this year was drilled in about a foot to fourteen inches apart in the row and made good ears. That for husking was drilled two feet apart in the row, with a special check-row wire and this was much easier to keep clean than the close drilled corn. Experience teaches that it is poor policy to drill corn on land that is foul with weeds, or on farms where little help is kept. Weeds will get the better of corn in wet weather and where help is lacking. Wide checked corn usually gets two or three cultivations before haying comes on and then will thrive fairly well, provided the weather is moist and hot. On the other hand the close drilled corn, with similar cultivation, tends to become choked by growth of weeds in the rows which never are perfectly buried by two or three ordinary cultivations and without the use of the hoe.

It may be remembered that we seeded four pounds of red clover per acre with the barley last spring. One and one half bushels of barley per acre gave a good crop and allowed a magnificent growth of clover. The stand was perfect and now the cows are pasturing that field and making more and more milk every day. They also have the run of an adjoining field from which a heavy crop of clover hay was taken in July. This field was seeded to red clover, alsike, Timothy and a little Alfalfa. The latter did well and gave the clover hay a beautiful green color. It was mowed away without a drop of rain and the plants are again making a nice growth and adding greatly to the value of the pasturing crop. As soon as the cattle have taken the best of these two fields they will be manured and fall plowed and next year will be in corn for the silo. We certainly are highly pleased with the investment in red clover seed with the barley crop and we also seeded it with the oats. Not such a good stand was had in the oat and wheat combination field. Still there is enough on the ground to furnish a good bite for the cows and to help as a manure for the next crop. We can strongly recommend seeding clover with every bushel of grain seeded on the farm.

Avoiding Scratches

By "scratches" is meant a condition of the skin of a horse's heels and fetlocks akin to that which we term "chapped hands" in man. It comes from wetting and lack of drying and will become worse if washed by the owner. To avoid such conditions do not wash a horse's legs from November to May; and any time they just have to be washed remember to rub them perfectly dry. The drying is best done by rubbing with sawdust or coarse corn-meal. The horse that has to stand in a cold draft in the stable while his legs are wet, is most liable to scratches. It is a mistake to clip off the long hair on a horse's legs, below the knees and hocks. The hair protects the skin and tends to prevent scratches. When a horse comes in with his hairy legs covered with mud allow them to dry; then rub off the mud. If such legs are washed the skin becomes wet and unless thoroughly dried will in time become affected with scratches. A good, simple ointment for scratches is made by mixing together one dram of spirits of camphor, two drams of sulphur and one ounce of lard. Apply it freely twice a day. Do not apply strong, drying (astringent) lotions or powders in cases of scratches. They do more harm than good. "Mud fever" is similar to scratches but affects the leg from foot to knee or hock. It is caused by mud, snow or wet and failure to dry the legs. Hot flaxseed poultices may be applied for two or three days. Then wash once, dry perfectly and afterward apply two or three times a day a lotion composed of two ounces of Goulard's extract and one ounce of glycerine with soft water to make one pint.

Grubbing Trees

On one farm the other day we saw some thirty or forty big white oak and black oak trees which had been grubbed instead of sawed through near the ground. The owner wished as quickly as possible to get the three-acre patch which had been pastured as timber land, reclaimed and plowed for cropping. And so the "boys" had grubbed the trees after a wet spell, when the ground was soft and they could not work on the land. "Some job," you say. "Yes; but after all it is a better plan than cutting down with the crosscut saw, or chopping with the axe, when the land has to be got into cropping condition quickly. It will require at least eight years for hard wood stumps to rot so that they may be pulled. If grubbed the logs can be sawed and the butts sledded out of the way, the holes filled and plowing started as soon as the frost is out in spring, or in fall, if the grubbing is done early. It usually is necessary to also grub hazel brush and sumac if they are strong growths. Why not use dynamite? some will enquire. Well, it can be done, and the stumps may be shattered in that way, but it is a somewhat dangerous job and the blast holes are often very large and hard to fill. The grubbing is a clean, quick job and we think it pays.

"THE turkey is not our national bird," said a patriotic looking party, "but it is the one that we give thanks over officially on one day in the year and that day in November. We call it Thanksgiving Day, but what the turkey calls it is not fit for publication. All of us know about Thanksgiving, but all of us don't know about the turkey. I didn't, till I read up a little. Like the potato, Indian corn and tobacco, the turkey originated in America and was unknown to the civilized world until the discovery of America by Columbus. It is generally believed to have been found in Mexico by the Spaniards and sent by them to Europe in 1518. The Spaniards first called the bird 'Pavo,' peafowl, because the Mexican variety has a more brilliant plumage than our Northern bird. The size of the fowl made it available for food supply on Spanish ships, the small vessels of those days not being able to accommodate many chicken coops, and in a very short time it was distributed to all parts of the known world. It was called 'turkey' because it was supposed by the great mass of people to have come from that country, though just why is not known. That Turkey, by the way, gets its name from Turk, son of Japheth, son of Noah, whose descendants people and named Turkestan whence come the present Turks. I don't swear to this, but that's what they say. In the Balkan states the turkey is known as the 'turke,' but in Turkey itself, it is known as the Hindu fowl. The Germans call it 'trut hahn,' or 'turkisher hahn;' the Italians and French, having received their first supply from India, call it 'gallo d'India' and 'poule d'Inde,' hence 'Dindon,' its pet name; it is 'gallo pavo' and 'gallo peru' to Spaniards and Portuguese, the latter supposing it to have come from Peru. In India it is known as 'peru,' or was when it went back to Europe in the sixteenth century. In Brazil it is 'pavo de Peru,' whence the Portuguese may have got the name as their ships went often to that country. There is no other country except ours that devotes a day to Thanksgiving and turkey, but the time may come when Thanksgiving and the turkey may become universal, the turkey at present being nearer that point than Thanksgiving is. In the mean time the turkeys of this country are viewing with alarm the day in this month of November when so many of them will be offered up on the altar of sacrifice and not one among them feels at all like giving thanks."

Her clothes were neglected and she was never loved or petted. Well, believe me, little daughter wanted her "mother" very badly. She had enough of it in a very little while but I, had will power enough to leave her there six months, then she came home. Such a change! She could not do enough for me. Just went on her knees and begged me never to send her from me again. She is all sweetness now. If a sulky look comes over her face, all I need say is "Do you want to go to Aunt —— again?" How quickly that frown vanishes and "Dear mother, I'll be good" is uttered with a kiss and fond embrace. This occurred years ago. She is twelve years old now and my little comfort indeed.

Could not "Steppy" do something like this? I would like to write to her personally.

Good luck and better times to "Steppy."

MOTHER.

Evidently "Steppy" has moved for I forwarded a number of letters to her and they were returned. If she sees this and will write me again I will be glad to remail them once more.—Ed.

LOXLEY, ALA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

May I come again from the sunny southland for a little chat?

I am quite well now, but just recovering from a bad fall I took last January. It might have been worse so "I'm glad" as Pollyanna says. I have many COMFORT friends whom I have formed acquaintance with through the Sisters' Corner, but haven't been able to answer many letters this summer.

We live on a sixty-acre farm two miles north of Loxley. Have fifty acres fenced with woven wire. Corn is our main crop with cow peas between the rows, some rice and Sudan grass for hay. Last spring we set out two acres of satsuma oranges and a few grafted pecan trees.

Two miles south of Loxley a company has set out over nine hundred acres to satsuma oranges, with kumquots for a border next to the fence. Most of the 1915 crop was shipped to Chicago where a ready sale was found.

Two years ago I set out several eucalyptus trees. They are over sixteen feet high now.

We keep chickens and cows. We have a cream separator and I make butter to sell. Have no trouble in making good, sweet, firm butter all the year round. To begin with, the cows must be kept clean. Our cows' udders are washed clean (not wiped off with a damp cloth) before each milking, then wiped dry with a clean cloth; then there is no dust and dirt to fall into the milk pail. We keep our cows in the barn nights during winter and always put them in to milk them. They are all pets.

Fig trees grow fast here and can be started from cuttings. They bear a few figs the second year and more as they grow older.

Don't you think, sisters, it is unjust that women should be forced to obey laws they have no power to make or unmake, yet under which they are taxed as men are? It would seem from experience that the more people know about equal suffrage the less afraid of it they would be. Then a voter does not vote all the time so the women would be allowed a number of days off to attend to their tatting and embroidery.

Now just a few words in the training of children. A mother should remember that her child is a free spirit that needs to be taught and not a servant to obey orders. Most parents teach their children to be untruthful; not intentionally, of course, but nevertheless they do. How often we hear this: "Now Jimmie, if you do that again I'll whip you." A few minutes later and Jimmie does it again but no whipping follows. Is it any wonder that Jimmie becomes a liar? The wonder is that he remains as truthful as he is. And sisters, please don't nag and always be faultfinding, but smile for we know a smile, like charity, covers a multitude of sins.

I received so much help from the Sisters' Corner that I must return my hearty thanks and try to help a little in my turn.

Kerosene applied to tarnished silver with a cloth and then washed off will leave a good luster.

Hot milk is valuable as a stimulant and very nourishing. Do not let it quite boil. Sip it slowly and feel your strength and courage coming back.

The big old world admires greatness but it lives by kindness and to the cheerful heart every day is fine and happiness is contagious.

On the State Fair Grounds at Salem, Oregon, they have a model dairy barn with different kinds of stalls for cows, to show how they can be kept clean. Some with trenches back of the stall and some without trenches. My husband took a pattern of a stall from this barn, called the Schumeric stall, which we have in our barn. I can't explain how it is made but the feeding rack is built up high enough so when the cow lies down she can lie with her head under the rack facing the feed way. A piece of timber is nailed back of the stall to keep her from lying back in the dirt. We don't like stanchions so tie the cows around the neck.

Last week my husband killed a hawk, one opossum and two skunks. The 'possum and skunks were after our corn and peanuts. We found out two years ago that they were very fond of chickens. The female 'possums have a pouch underneath in which they carry their young. They are like the kangaroo in that respect.

I wonder if any of the sisters ever get the wanderlust and want to travel? My husband and I both like to travel. It has been very beneficial to our health but bad for our pocketbook and bank account. We have crossed the Rocky Mountains six times and have lived in Washington, Oregon, Wisconsin and Alabama. In the summer of 1907 we took our team and hack and drove all over Oregon, up one side and down the other, slept in a tent for three months, wherever night overtook us; saw all the beautiful snow-capped mountain peaks and crater lake on top of a mountain. We would like to travel again next summer by team or auto but if we do we will have to sell or rent our farm. We are planning on going sometime but don't know how soon it will be. I hope to be able to take subscriptions to COMFORT if we ever go.

I like farm life much better than the city, but don't get time to read as much as I would like; maybe though the people who work in factories and mills don't get any more time to read than the farm people. The quiet life of the country encourages study. I read not long ago that at a meeting of successful business men in New York City that out of five hundred present, over ninety per cent had been reared in the country.

I wish to thank the sisters who sent me silk and velvet pieces for my state quilt, and will answer all who send stamps or stamped envelope.

Sincerely, MRS. P. S. HENDRY.

LORE CITY, Lock Box 22, OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for about fourteen years or ever since I could first read. I take several magazines, all of which are good, but COMFORT is in a class by itself. I have one little boy two years and a half old and my small sister is six years old. They enjoy the Cubby Bear stories more than any other story I can tell them. My mother has been dead two years and my little sister stays with me. I have been married four years and have one of the good Johns we read about, only he is a Jim. We try to be partners in everything and there is only one pocketbook in our family and we both know where it is kept.

I wonder if some middle aged woman on reading this would like a good place to stay? My Dad is trying to keep the two small boys together, with him, but a good capable woman is so hard to get that he is about discouraged. He would pay good wages and anyone would have full charge. Isn't there someone who can fill this place? Dad is French but mother was an American. I would like to help him if I can. Anyone interested in this place, please write to me. The boys are twelve and fourteen years of age and one young man besides father.

I am five feet seven inches tall, brown hair and eyes, plenty of freckles and am jolly and full of the joy of living. I am twenty-five years young. My husband is ten years my senior. I don't believe in early marriages.

My little boy stammers. I try not to notice and make him repeat the words slowly but he still stammers. Can someone suggest something else?

Yours very sincerely, MRS. LOTTIE GIFFEN.

——, MICHIGAN.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for some time but until I saw Steppy's letter I never had the courage to write. Perhaps I can do some good, for I, too, am a stepmother.

My husband had two children when we were married and now we have two more. I have had my heart aches but now I have my reward. My family are grown up and they all think there is no one like mother. My stepchildren were like yours, at first and it seemed there was nothing too mean for them to do. Talk to them, ask them what their own mother would think of them if she knew how they were acting. I found that talking to them in this way would touch a tender spot in their hearts and bring better results quicker than anything else.

At dishwashing time, after the work is finished, let them have a good time by making candy, having a party and help them make doll clothes. Of course you cannot do this every time but it helps to win them. My husband had quite a temper and believed in whippings but I did not at such times and tried to save them from being punished and they soon learned to have confidence in me. Of course there were times when I had to be firm and let them know I was to be obeyed. Try and make home pleasant and they will not want to go away as many do on account of having a mean stepmother. It means a great deal but I think stepmothers will receive double reward for taking the place of two mothers. Kindness and patience will certainly win them. Keep up your courage and may be some day you can sign yourself what I am,

A loved and happy stepmother.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.

TO MY DEAR SISTER WITH THE LITTLE GIRL THAT POUTS:

Bless your heart, you are lucky with only one little girl that pouts—what if you had three little pouting girls like I have. Until you drew my attention to it, I thought it pertained to nature. My grandmother read your letter and she said that seventy-five years ago she knew a little girl who pouted—none other than herself—she is eighty-five now so you see it has been handed down from generation to generation. I believe all children pout—sometimes grown people too.

I was a school teacher before I married and some days I had as many as thirty-five pouters. Your baby Alice is not eligible to join the Pouter's Club, but I feel safe in assuring you that as soon as her age will permit she will be a staunch member.

I have three girls, and not one alike in disposition. Louise, age seven is a very quiet, reserved little dear, she cannot take a joke or be teased in any way so we regard her feelings and we have no trouble in that line. Then she pouts and makes herself very miserable sometimes she pouts a whole day, but we do do not believe in corporal punishment so let her come out of it herself. We take no heed of her but read or sing and play with the other children. On the other hand, she is a dear little mother's helper and we love her dearly. Her father says that when she gets older and deals with the public it will bring her out of it, but her little hands and feet are ever willing to help mother, and she never complains.

Evelyn, aged five, not only pouts but has a temper that goes with it; gets cross and destroys her playthings and musses up her hair, but we can joke her. She never pouts or is angry very long.

Last, but not least, Cecelia, our baby of three years, jumps down from the table if she isn't satisfied with the way things are being served, but we just let her go and after a while she comes back looking very much ashamed of herself. She expects to be coaxed but we do not notice her. Then again she gets angry and pouts and we cannot get her in a good humor by petting or joking, it makes her worse, so I pay no attention to her and eventually she is playing and as happy as a bird. I think parents, as a rule, pay too much attention to their children's faults.

I love one just as dearly as the others, as all natural mothers do, but I often wonder if Louise loves mother best? Her one thought is of doing something for me or for her sisters.

Let's be patient, dear sisters, God only loaned them to us and He can call His own at any time. We mothers are also only loaned to them. If God should call me from my little ones I want them to always think, "Mother was always good to me," for I love their little bodies too well to do them any injury.

I hope you and your girlies will have many blessings bestowed upon you and that they will rise up and call you blessed.

A COMFORT SISTER.

NEBO, N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Will you admit a sister from the "Old North State," the land of the long leaf pine?

Nebo is a little village almost surrounded by mountains. The scenery is very picturesque but I fear we who live here do not appreciate it as much as those from other places who come here. Strangers almost go wild with delight over our wonderful mountain scenery which we seldom think of admiring.

Betty, I will suggest "Sunny View" as a pretty and appropriate name for your home.

By the way, I noticed in a letter in the April COMFORT in which Mrs. Beneze discussed the art of right dressing. I agree with part of what you say Mrs. Beneze, but I certainly do not agree with you when you say that some women looked as though they were never introduced to corsets, meaning that they should wear corsets. The soiled kimono, the house slippers and the bushy head may be objected to but please do not object to women going corsetless for that is just the way they should always be. You may ask how women would look if they were to allow their forms to go unlaced? I answer, they would look as God intended they should. At present of course Fashion does not demand such an extremely slender waist but if Fashion demanded it women would, if possible, devise some plan to contract their waists to the fashionable standard. The evil effects, however, of the present corset wearing are almost beyond estimation. The bone structure of the human body is so constructed as to give just enough room for the free action of every internal organ and the least construction of this human framework throws some organ out of place or deprives it of the room required in order to properly perform its functions. As a general rule, young girls begin to wear corsets when about thirteen years of age and often before. At that age the bone structure is very tender and if incased in a corset it can never attain its full growth. Why is it that mothers cannot understand this? Has the All-wise architect of our bodies made a mistake in giving us our proportions? What a shame that we should thus reflect upon the Creator and change His plans to suit the desires of a wicked world and bring disease and physical weakness instead of health and vigor. No woman who wears a corset can properly breathe as she should. The entire nervous system is overheated, crushed and deformed by the use of the corset. What a great thing it would be if the women of America would turn a deaf ear to fashion and give more heed to the laws of hygiene and common sense. I wonder if there is anyone who will agree with me on this subject?

Before leaving you I wish to say that I have read COMFORT for several years and certainly could not do without it.

I am five feet three inches tall and weigh one hunded and nine pounds. Have dark hair, eyes and complexion. Was nineteen years old the fifth of July. Am too late for a birthday shower but would like cards just the same.

With kindest regards to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the COMFORT readers, MRS. J. C. MASON.

PENDLETON, S. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Please let me thank all that have written me such nice letters and cards since my letter appeared in April COMFORT. I have tried to reply to all letters from shut-ins, especially those that were so lonely. Some have written that they have sent letters and cards and received no answer. Friends, if you sent stamps and have time, don't get discouraged. If your "God Bless You" and "Best Wishes" have meant as much to others as they have to me perhaps they have been "the cup of cold water given in His name," and you will not lose your reward.

So many have wanted to know how they could help my afflicted one. To all those I would say, he can only enjoy music and good things to eat and being rolled in his wheel chair. My only girl, eleven years old, and I do all our work and care for him and she is in school a large portion of the time.

I have read about all of Harold Bell Wright's books and "The Calling of Dan Matthews" is my favorite. I do so much admire the trained nurse, the heroine of the book, then I quite agree with the author in regard to churches, etc.

Dickens' travels in America during 1840 interested me very much, as did the "Tale of Two Cities," "The Pickwick Papers" and "David Copperfield." Would that we had more of the kind of love that was in Sidney Carson's heart, in the "Tale of Two Cities." And I smile now when I think of Mr. Micawber in "David Copperfield," always looking for something to "turn up," and I'm hoping something will "turn up" some day with me and give me time to reply to all your nice letters.

Mrs. Wilkinson, I felt that I wanted to change the name of our little farm, "Oakgate" to one of those suggested in May COMFORT. We gave ours this name because two oak trees stand near enough to give the effect of one passing through a gate as they enter the yard. "Happy Hill" has a good ring to me. Perhaps I am not always as happy as I should be but believe in "playing that I am" and the name would be a good incentive.

I think I will pin a blue ribbon on my May COMFORT, for surely the letters on Woman Suffrage make it the finest ever. It seems that nothing more could be said for, or against, the cause and I'm sure we will all rise now and make the vote for it unanimous. COMFORT, it seems, is not what it once was to some because of the stand some have taken on preparedness, but there is one consolation—we all want peace, we just differ as to how best to keep peace. I, for one, can't see how not being prepared will keep peace any more than I can see that being prepared will assure peace. Germany seems to be prepared to fight nearly the whole of Europe and you know the killing that is being done in Germany is about the same as in other countries—but it's only a woman's point of view—if other nations ever attack our shores there will be plenty of men, and even women, who will go to their unfortunate friends and it will be nothing but right, and "Thrice armed is he whose cause is just."

It was a Northern soldier who, during the Civil War, told his sister who was praying for her Confederate lover to be spared and his side to win, that "A woman's heart knows no country and no flag, pray for the man you love."

Mrs. Wilkinson, please pardon me for not being more brief, I only intended thanking my friends and they, I feel now, are all the way from Honolulu to Canada and in almost every state in the Union and are from sixteen years of age to one hundred and three. Many of them are doing a grand work for the shut-ins and more have written that they are going to do more. One woman said she was going to give up so much ice cream and candy. Let us all find a way to do our best. One dear old lady in a large city says she feels like a cat in a strange garret when she attends a modern city church. Let us be careful friends.

COMFORT friends, we may never exchange friendly smiles,
But let's shake hands across the miles.

MRS. R. O. BROCK.

POLLOCK, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

After reading Mrs. Mattie Fugitt's letter in July number of COMFORT I thought I would stop being a silent reader, even at the risk of landing in the waste-basket.

In my opinion it is next to impossible to raise just one child without it being selfish and hard to please. Even when there are two this is likely to be the case. But why bring children into the world to suffer the pangs and temptations of bitter poverty? Why not fewer children and better ones? To have healthy children there must be a measure of sanitary conditions, well-cooked food, proper clothing, and so on, all of which takes time and work to say nothing of expense. Is it right that a mother should have no time for rest, no time to read and keep up with events enough to be a companion and wise friend to her children? No time to care for and promote her own health that she may be able to cope with the many problems and the work that falls to the lot of those in such circumstances that they are unable to hire help. Is there not a happy medium between too many and too few? Indeed it is wrong to shun motherhood in order that one or two children may be raised in luxury and granted every whim. Indeed it is fiendish to destroy the unborn as too many conscienceless creatures do. But why not a smaller number in order to bring them up in simple, wholesome comfort? A mother whose time is all taken up with cooking, cleaning, washing, ironing and sewing for a large family has little time to study each child and give it the individual attention it needs to bring out the best of its nature and discourage the worst, to say nothing of a little time for recreation for herself. A day of pleasure for the family means a double strain on her as every mother of a large family can testify and rare indeed is she who can keep sweet tempered and set a good example for her little ones when with failing health and straining nerves she must drudge on, day after day, with never a moment's time she can call her own. I think Satan smiles more at such conditions that God does. No, Providence did not intend or cause such suffering so do not lay the blame there. Have as many children as health will permit, as you can give proper care and attention, and they will be a blessing to you and everyone else and God, who is just, will say "Well done," when you have wisely kept yours strong physically and spiritually in order that you may send better children into the world. Yes, better than you are at your best. Teach them that they may avoid the mistakes you have made, stand between them and Satan and fail not to teach them to lean upon a mighty Friend above. If children are worth dying for they are worth living for. I am a mother and I would not change places with any single woman I know, but I do not intend to use the power God gave me to bring little ones with immortal souls, into the world to bring sorrow upon all concerned. And if I did so I would lay the blame where it belonged. Such a condition is unjust and therefore none of God's planning for He is just.

This is the conclusion at which I have arrived after looking at both sides of the question.

God bless you Mrs. Fugitt and all other mothers that suffer with matchless heroism that they may be the means of doing some good in this world. Such earnest intent to do good and right will surely be rewarded in the life to come.

Respectfully yours, MRS. E. M. SMITH.

CHIRICAHUA, Cochise County, ARIZONA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

The last time I took a peep into our valuable corner was November 1915, so maybe after all I am not too often.

While I long believed the waste-basket got its deserved morsel when my last letter helped fill it, yet how pleasantly surprised I was in April last to receive my old sombrero full of letters in one post in answer thereto, it having actually reached COMFORT Corner certainly having accidently evaded close criticism of each of the COMFORT staff. I made up my mind then and there to immediately stop housekeeping and drudgery and make a great writer of myself. I felt sure, by next post, writing was my calling, but by the next week I fully decided I was surely one of the sorriest, most uninteresting writers in the United States. I tried my best to make my letters in reply to my correspondents as interesting to them and their individual requirements as theirs were to me, but what a miserable failure I feel I am! However, I believe I have learned what my talent consists of now; that of envying others for their ability to write so interestingly.

I have to date received nearly five hundred pieces of mail from all parts of the United States and have replied to the best of my ability to each and all; if I have not filled requirements, sisters, please pardon and attribute any seeming failures and errors to mental capacity and not to my heart.

Not a few letters returned "unclaimed;" then I went over all letters and found I had made only two mistakes in addresses, wrote them later; some have again returned.

I want to thank each one for the good letters, lovely post-cards, valuable books, flowers and garden seeds, pressed flowers, etc., and other pretty and valuable tokens of love sent me and my little girl, Bonnie.

I am not an invalid exactly; it might ruffle my feelings terribly to be told that by some for I am fifty-five years young. I am a "shut-in" by living out a homestead via homestead requirements of the United States, I am a widow, and I want each one to know they have contributed very materially, to our otherwise would-be sordid existence, much cheer, comfort, pleasure and blessings. We also received several sub-

Preparing Birds for the Showroom

OWNERS of thoroughbred fowls should enter one or more of them at their local or state fair, for a showroom endorsement increases profits considerably. It changes the value of thirteen eggs from the ordinary market price of twenty-five to forty cents to two dollars, and sometimes even to five dollars a setting, if your birds happen to be good enough to capture two or three first prizes at different shows during the same season. So everyone who keeps poultry should do some showing, if they keep thoroughbred birds. Every poultry keeper should thank the clubs and fanciers through whose work shows have been established in different parts of the country, or they arouse general interest in good stock, and bring the cream of profit to the breeder industrious enough to study the standard and develop point by point until their birds approach perfection.

First, of course, you must have some thoroughbred birds, of whatever breed you intend to devote your energies to. Many people think that "thoroughbred" and "full-blooded" means a breed sure to win prizes. But that is a great mistake. A bird which has been hatched from an egg laid by a champion may develop a wry tail, comb, wattles or earlobes that are off color or out of proportion, or some other small blemish which quite unfits him for competition in a showroom. Yet he would of course be a thoroughbred bird. This is why it is often possible to buy full-blooded birds at reasonable prices from established fanciers, and by good mating develop prize winners in your own yards. Having good, pure-blooded birds, you must study their faults, and breed to counterbalance them. To explain: If you have a hen with legs slightly too long, coarse comb, or some such slight defect, mate her to a rooster which has short legs, or a very fine comb. It is only by this means that improvement can be made in a flock.

You who have been breeding from well-selected birds will surely have a few good youngsters worthy of being sent to the showroom, and it is none too soon to start on their training and special care.

It is not possible to tell just how a bird will develop, so it is best to prepare several, even if you only contemplate entering two or three. Of course, there must be thoroughbred stock to start with, but feeding and general care have much to do with success. The best blood won't take a prize if the bird is out of condition either in health or plumage. The selected birds should be confined in a special house and yard, and accustomed to handling. A little patience will soon get them so tame that they will eat out of your hand. Once used to being picked up and stroked they will not be frightened when put up for public admiration, nor will they give the judge trouble when they have to be examined for points. But if the birds are taken from large yards and sent off in small coops to be handled by strangers, they invariably get sick, and show to such poor advantage that they fail to receive their due rating.

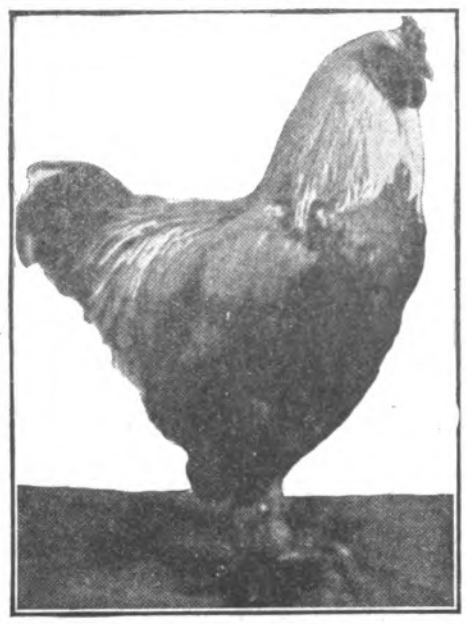
The Standard of Perfection instructs judges to deduct two points a pound for any deficit from standard, or one half point an ounce for any excess over the standard in bantams. In all varieties of turkeys, geese and ducks having weight clauses, three points per pound are deducted for any deficit from standard. This short summary will prove the importance of weight.

Feeding and Care

First, the frame of the bird must be the right size, so that firm, sound flesh will cause it to tip the scales at the right mark. Over-fattened birds lose shape and condition. Many birds of good shape, size and build fail to receive awards because of condition and plumage, more the result of feed and care than of breeding. I have seen a bird take first prize at one show, and at another later in the season, when out of condition, be passed over entirely.

From time of selecion, feed good, sound food three times a day—just the amount they will eat clean in ten minutes. Never throw down unlimited supplies, or they will get over-fat and lazy. A quarter of the whole grain each day should be hemp or sunflower seed, to make the feathers bright and glossy. A good mash feed for the last few weeks is rice or wheat boiled in milk. If your birds are white or light-colored, shade them from the full rays of the sun, for it has a tendency to tan white feathers and impoverish the quality of the buff plumage.

The day before shipping, light-colored fowls of any sort should be washed. Don't gasp—it's not by any means a difficult undertaking—but must be done thoroughly, or the result will be anything but pleasing to behold. An ordinary wash-boiler makes a good bath, because of the oblong shape. Put enough warm water into it to cover the bird. Make a lather of good white soap. Stand the fowl in the water and soak for a few minutes. With a moderately soft brush, scrub down and across the feathers, but never upward. Go at it with a will—don't be afraid—and work as quickly as you can. When every spot is removed, hold up the bird and have some one empty and refill the bath with clean water; rinse, repeating the scrubbing downward, to remove the soap. Repeat this process with the third and fourth water. On the rinsing depends the success of this washing. When every vestige of soap has disappeared, stand the bird in a tray and dry with a soft towel. Next, brush downward with a fairly stiff, dry brush; then place in a drying cage. This is easily made of wire netting, sides and top, with a wooden floor, and a perch across the center for the bird to roost on, high enough to prevent its tail touching the floor. Cover the floor with three inches of sawdust, so that all droppings will immediately be absorbed. The cage should be placed in a warm corner out of all draft, and in a surprisingly short time the feathers will begin to web and fluff out.



Let me warn you—if the water is too warm, the fowl may faint. Don't be alarmed. No permanent harm will result. It will revive immediately the head is doused in cold water. Get all the dirt off the legs and feet; next morning rub just a touch of vaseline over the extremities to soften and brighten them.

The shipping coops should be large enough for the birds to stand upright in. As most shows are held in cold weather, cover the open parts with strong, unbleached muslin. Personally, I I think the exhibitors should go with the birds, or send a trusty attendant to all shows. Such a course assures better care on the journey, and enables you to care for their health during the trying time of close confinement which competing for honors condemns the birds to. Your presence often procures better bench accommodations, insures coops which are free from dust, clean drinking cups, and all the small details which help a good appearance.

Correspondence

E. D. M.—Swollen head, fever and hard breathing, suggest a severe cold more than any other disease, so I don't think the sprouted oats can have caused the trouble, though sour, maggoty grain of any kind is very liable to cause indigestion and limberneck. There may be a knothole or crack in the side of the chicken-house which caused a draft which struck the hen either when on the roost or nest. Better look the house over carefully. Whenever a bird shows symptoms of cold, such as sneezing, coughing, or any swelling around the head or eyes, the safest plan is to doctor for roup. Dissolve one teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in one quart of water. For use, dilute one tablespoonful of the lotion with three of water. Spray the bird's eyes, nostrils and throat three times a day for a week, or longer, if necessary. Roup is a very contagious disease, and any form of cold is likely to develop into malignant roup if neglected; for this reason, it is better to treat a bird at once without loss of time. The suspicious cases should be confined in a small quarantine coop placed in a sheltered sunny shed, or outdoors, far removed from the rest of the poultry. The only unmistakable symptom of roup which is not present in any other form of cold, is an offensive odor of the bird's breath, which is easily noticed if the beak is opened. Oats should not be started in water or dirt. The best method is to knock the bottom out of a shallow box, and replace with burlap. (A piece of an old feed bag will do.) Nail it tight across the bottom of the box with small tacks. Soak the oats in a pail of water for twelve hours. Drain, and spread two inches thick over the burlap. Set the box on blocks, or something to raise it a little, so that the air can circulate under it. Spread two or three thicknesses of newspaper over the oats, and keep in a warm place. Remove the paper every morning and stir the oats about until the sprouts are visible. Sprinkle every day with warm water, and remove the paper entirely when the sprouts are about half an inch high. Feed when sprouts are two inches high.

A. G.—I am afraid the turkey has what is called blackhead—a name which is very misleading, as the head turning black is only one of the symptoms which develop occasionally when turkeys are in an advanced stage of a disease which is especially characterized by sores in the cocum and liver, which are caused by a protozoan, which has been named Amoeba meleagridis, a minute protoplasmic animal, found to vary between six and ten millionths of an inch in diameter. While they are microscopic in size, they are at least three to four times larger than the red blood corpuscles, but they are, nevertheless, small enough to float in the blood capillaries of the portal system from the cocum to the liver, where they seem to be stopped from going further. This short description of the parasite contains all that is of general interest. It may be summed up as follows: the amoeba is a microscopic animal or parasite capable of living within the tissues of the turkey, its host. It can, therefore, eat, grow, and reproduce itself in large numbers, thereby causing irritations, destruction of the tissues, and nearly always death of the invalid turkeys. The majority of young poults die after a day or two of droopiness. Adults may droop longer and pass into chronic stages of the disease. Refusal to eat and standing apart constitute late symptoms. Starvation in chronic cases produces thinness. When the disease in the cocum is slight, it is doubtful if the affected animals have diarrhea, which is more or less present in other cases. In many of the older poults the droppings will be liquid, and stained orange yellow; this is the most characteristic symptom of all. Sometimes there are blackened blood clots in the droppings, indicating slight hemorrhages. Experiments show that more than four fifths of the young poults exposed to infected yards die before they are six weeks old. The disease has been popularly supposed to be one confined to older birds. It is notably a disease affecting young turkeys, but one from which the older turkeys do not escape. Of the one fifth which do escape or survive its ravages, at least ten to twenty per cent may die, throughout the year, at almost any age. Examination of the organs is the only sure means of telling the cause of death. The amoebae are transmitted from diseased turkeys to others through the droppings, which contaminate the food with which they come in contact. Evidence obtained here indicates that the amoebæ may also be carried by ordinary fowl, and may be transmitted to turkeys by them in the same manner. So you see once again the importance of exercising strict cleanliness is impressed upon us poultry people, for if droppings are removed regularly, there is little danger of infection. Plow up the old yards and ground where poultry usually congregate. Disinfect the coops and houses, and don't let the turkeys roost in the same house with the hens. An open shed is the best place for them, even in zero weather. After blackhead, I think the most serious trouble that assails turkeys is worms. In fact, some authorities declare that they are the fundamental cause of blackhead. Now, I am a strong believer in prevention rather than cure, and my advice is, to take time by the forelock, and dose the old birds for worms right now. Then there will be less fear of contamination in the spring, when young ones are around. You may not realize that the old birds have worms, for unless they are very badly affected, they cause the old birds no special inconvenience, nor materially affect the health of old birds; but young stock are not strong enough to stand any strain on their vitality, and what is more, all intestinal parasites seem to develop and mature more rapidly in young creatures than in mature stock. Young birds can be kept free if they are properly fed, unless they become contaminated by droppings from other birds. For this reason it is wisdom to purify the old birds, who are strong enough to stand medicine; besides, it is easier to dose a few old birds than a lot of youngsters. Put fifteen grains of asafetida into a quart of water. Empty the ordinary drinking vessels and put in the mixture. This dose should be given two nights in succession, once a month during the winter, and when the little ones commence to arrive, chop up the green tops of onions and mix with pot cheese or any other soft food you may be using, for at least one feed a day, and don't torture the poor little creatures with red pepper. On cold, wet days, add a little ginger and sugar to the drinking water, making it just about as strong as you would for a baby. The address of the people making the tablets has been sent you, by mail, but they would be useless now that the disease has developed.

G. O. R.—Turkeys can be raised in captivity if the enclosures are large enough. One acre would do for the old birds all through the winter. If in the spring you enclose half an acre for each hen, put her in her own yard as soon as she is bred. She will lay her eggs and rear her brood without any further trouble. Feed your old stock as you would any other poultry during the winter, but not quite so heavily, as they don't lay in cold weather. Yes, they must have grit at all times. Any clean sharp gravel will do. If you haven't any supply on hand, it can be bought at poultry supply houses. For advice regarding sick birds, please read answer to A. G.

C. A. P.—All poultry supply and seed stores have caponizing tools for sale. Price varies from a dollar to two and a half.

E. M.—Please read answer to A. G. If on free range, feed nothing until about three months old, then just a little wheat or cracked corn when they come up at night. "Shooting the red" has nothing to do with the development of blackhead.

P. M. N.—The chickens had cocoiddiosis, a disease caused by a minute form of animal life called coccidæ, which multiply very rapidly after they are once introduced into the bird's body, and are distributed by the droppings of affected birds. The germs are usually found in that part of the small intestine nearest the gizzard, where they cause inflammation and thickening of the lining. After a time the disease may extend to the liver and lungs. Wild birds often suffer from it, and their droppings are usually the cause of outbreaks in chicken yards. The best treatment is to put three grains of copperas in the drinking water, and use asafetida as recommended for turkeys in answer to A. G.

J. S.—Please read the first part of the department of this month. It deals with preparing birds for the show room.

L. A. L.—Reading the first part of your letter, I thought the birds had bronchitis. Then I noticed the postscript, in which you added the information that there was a discharge from the nostrils, and the cheesy substance in the intestines of the bird you opened, which entirely changed my diagnosis of the case, and I now think the birds are suffering from what is called blackhead, which, as a rule, only develops severely in turkeys, where it frequently originates in fowls which carry it in a chronic form, and spread the disease through their droppings. Please read answer to A. G. and E. D. M. and use combined treatment.

O. F. F.—Can't understand what caused the young ducks to die off so rapidly. I suppose you know that they must not get wet until they have got all their feathers, and that drinking water must be in a deep, partly covered dish, so that they can get their heads entirely under water. Otherwise the little holes at the base of the bill, through which they breathe, are liable to get stuffed up with mash or dirt, and the poor little creatures will smother to death. They must also have plenty of sand and green vegetables mixed with their food, and be kept on dry ground, with some protection from the noonday sun. Pekin ducks are the best all round bird.

V. M. K.—Please read answer to A. G. It explains the cause of troubles with young turkeys and suggests remedies.

L. G. M.—You will have better success with ducks if you keep them entirely away from swimming water until they are fully feathered. Read answer to O. F. F. The best way to rid the birds of worms is to give them a few doses of eggs and turpentine, mixed with a little grain, every second morning until they have had three doses. Beat an egg and one tablespoonful of turpentine together, and mix with enough grain to make a crumbly mass. Feed when the birds are fasting in the early morning, and see that each one gets a fair share.

E. W. S.—Do you keep the coop dry and clean? Ducks' droppings are very watery, and soon make the bedding they sleep on damp and unhealthy. The bedding should be at least six inches deep, and the soiled part should be removed every morning; the rest shaken up and allowed to dry, and a little fresh added each day. Read answer to O. F. F.

P. M.—You have given me so little information about the bird's condition and your method of feeding that I am quite unable to discover what the trouble may be. Read letter to L. G. M. I think it may help you.

L. H.—I fear the chickens and ducks have roup, or very severe indigestion. From your account I cannot be sure which it really is. Read answer to E. D. M.

M. M.—Guinea fowl are naturally extremely shy and suspicious of strangers, but readily succumb to patient coaxing, and their confidence once gained, they become friendly and devoted, guarding the place with the watchful care of a good dog; in fact, so far as the poultry is concerned, they are more useful, for they seem to possess intuition of the hawk's approach, and their shrill cry frightens the chicken thieves more effectually than a gun. They need no special house, all that is necessary for their comfort being a roost high up in a shed. If left to themselves, they take to the trees, and in all probability will get frozen if the winters should be very severe, so the safest plan with new birds is to cover the front of a shed with two-inch wire netting, just tacking it up lightly so that it can easily be removed at the end of two or three weeks, when they are accustomed to their new quarters. While they are prisoners, feed a trio two or three times a day, about half a pint of mixed wheat and cracked corn night and morning, and at noon about half the quantity of grain with a little chopped meat or ground bone alternating with the vegetables. All this food should be cut quite small, or the guineas will not eat it. Like other birds, they must have a constant supply of sharp grit and fresh water. As a market commodity they have been growing in favor during the last five years, to take the place of game during the closed season. Guinea fowls commence laying when the first warm days come in April. As it is their natural instinct to be very secretive about laying, some patience and diplomacy are necessary to locate their nests. The usual spot selected is a hollow in the ground, by the root of a tree, or a fence post well screened by brush. Don't attempt to approach it while they are in sight. Go away and return later armed with a long-handled spoon. The eggs are almost the color of the earth, and often covered with fallen leaves, so it needs a sharp eye to detect them. Be very careful not to touch the nest with your hand. Guineas seem to be able to scent the human hand about the nest; they can also count up to three. For that reason leave that number of eggs in the nest, removing the others with the spoon, to insure there being no telltale clues left to arouse Mrs. Guinea's suspicions.

F. H. R.—The symptoms you describe are those of limberneck, which is caused by impure food or water. As your neighbor's chickens are also affected, it is most likely that there is a stagnant pool, or the carcase of some dead animal in the meadow. A tablespoonful of Castor oil, followed two hours later by a teaspoonful of sweet oil, is a helpful remedy in such cases if administered at once.

J. T. W.—Undoubtedly the rooster died from enlargement of the liver. Too much corn and potatoes, or other fattening food, or stimulating powders and drugs, are likely to cause such troubles. The bird may have been abnormally greedy, and eaten more than a fair share of the daily rations. As a safeguard, you had better catch and examine some of the other birds. If they seem very fat and heavy, change your method of feeding, and if they are confined to yards, be sure that they have plenty of sharp grit before them all the time, and plenty of green vegetable food. Cabbages, beets or sprouted oats are best during the winter. Failing this, chopped clover or alfalfa hay, very fine, steamed for several hours, and mixed with their mash; and add one teaspoonful of powdered muriate of ammonia to every quart of drinking water from that day until they have had three doses.

A. E. D.—I have used board floors in the large houses for ten years and find them quite satisfactory, but we always cover them to a depth of six inches with corn-stalks or dried leaves and common hay, adding a top-dressing of leaves about two inches deep every two weeks, and cleaning out thoroughly once every six weeks during the winter. I have never tried using brine for lice and mites, but I should think it might be serviceable. We scrub out the house with a mixture of strong soapsuds, adding two ounces of carbolic acid and a small cup of kerosene to each pailful. The houses are thoroughly cleaned late in the fall, and as soon as the weather is at all warm in the spring. Dropping boards and roosts are cleaned every day, and nests once a week. Birds are powdered every other night for a week before they are put into their winter quarters, and a week later they are powdered three nights in succession, and again thoroughly dosed in the spring, before the breeding season. If the houses and birds are kept clean, you need not worry about vermin congregating in wooden floors.

W. L. R.—We don't publish any poultry book, nor have we White Wyandottes or other poultry for sale. You may find what you want in the advertising columns.

W. F. H.—Of course there is always some danger of eggs being frozen when shipped during extremely cold weather, but I have had them come hundreds of miles to me and have shipped safely. It depends greatly on the way they are packed. (2) Mash made of equal parts of ground corn, oats and wheat bran, chopped clover hay, and one half part of beef scraps or any of the commercial animal foods; scratch feed made of equal parts of wheat, oats, cracked corn and Kafir corn. Whole corn for supper. If you are keeping Leghorns or any of the light breeds, one rooster is enough to mate to fifteen hens. For Plymouth Rocks, Orpingtons, Wyandottes or Rhode Island Reds, better have two male birds.

L. C.—It was all right to mate the old drake to young ducks, if he was a good bird and not more than five years of age. Young ducks' eggs, especially Muscovys, rarely hatch well the first year. Five ducks are enough for each drake to take care of. The feet, shanks and bill usually show age. The bill gets dark at the base, and the shanks and feet coarse and hard looking. Better get a drake that is not related to your ducks to mate with the birds you raise next season.

A. M. P.—It would take more than the space allowed for our whole poultry department to answer your letter fully. Look up some of your back numbers of COMFORT, and read this department each month. You will find directions for feeding and the care necessary at different seasons of the year given in timely order, also suggestions for coops and houses. White Wyandottes, Orpingtons, Plymouth Rocks and Rhode Island Reds, are all good, general purpose fowls.

E. P.—The birds have chicken pox, which is contagious and quickly spreads from bird to bird, so quarantine all cases as soon as noticed. Give light nourishing food; ground oats, mixed with finely chopped Alfalfa or clover hay which has been steamed for several hours, is good. Give milk which has been scalded and allowed to cool, instead of water, to drink. Rub carbolic vaseline on the sores to soften them. Let it remain two hours, then bathe in warm, soapy water. Dry on a clean, soft rag, then bathe with a saturated solution of boric acid. If the eyes are inflamed, bathe frequently with the following solution. Dissolve three quarters of an ounce of boric acid and half an ounce of borate of soda in a pint of warm water. The disease rarely causes death unless the birds get chilled. Keep in a dry, sheltered coop.

W. H. S.—I cannot recommend breeders in this column. Look through the poultry advertisements in COMFORT; I think you will find what you require.

Comfort's League of Cousins

What however seems to you a mystery is not so much a mystery at all. It is not because God goes around protecting dirty people, putting muzzles on the bacilli and bacteria which are swarming about them that they escape disease and death. The odds are these people are particularly tough physical specimens with constitutions strong enough to withstand every known germ except perhaps that of bubonic plague, or some other knock-out germ of that description. Nature is a wise old guy and she took especial care to make a few people here and there immune from almost every form of germ life. If this had not been so the race long ago would have ceased to exist. When the white man came to this country he brought certain diseases which only had a mild effect on him but which were perfectly deadly when they were communicated to the Indians. Those diseases had been peculiar to Europe so many centuries, and had been passed on from generation to generation, that they gradually lost their virulence. You are probably aware that you can only have certain diseases once. These diseases leave behind a substance which unites with the poisonous bacteria and renders them harmless. In our blood we have dear, good blessed angelic little policemen called leucocytes or phagocytes, and whenever you get a scratch the leucocytes rush to the danger spot and keep the naughty bad bacteria from invading the body. If the bacteria however force their way in, the good little policeman or scavengers of the blood will put up a terrific fight with the invading bacteria and inflammation will result, and a white creamy mass known as pus will form and be discharged from the wound. This creamy mass is comprised of dead bacteria and good little leucocytes. If the leucocytes are victorious in the struggle they start forming new tissue and the wound heals. If the bacteria win, pus invades the blood and then you have what is called septicæmia or blood poisoning, a terribly dangerous condition. If it were not for those good little scavenger corpuscles in the blood, those dirty people who seem to defy disease would be quickly snuffed out. Now don't get it into your head that there is nothing in the germ theory of disease and that cleanliness and sanitation do not help to keep down the death rate. I've written on this subject before so it is not necessary to go over all the ground covered in previous articles. It is cleanliness and sanitation, keeping bodies, homes and streets clean that has lengthened human life enormously. In the place where I was born some forty years ago the death rate was about twenty-seven for every thousand inhabitants. That means that nearly thirty people per thousand died every twelve months. When sewerage systems were introduced into that town and wells abolished, and water carried through pipes, and the rains no longer transported germs from body waste down through the soil, and so on into the old oaken bucket that hung in the well, typhoid ceased its ravages and today only eleven people in a thousand die in that town where nearly thirty died forty years ago. There are still dirty people in that town who make coal bins of their bath tubs, but they can't give anyone typhoid fever and they can't get typhoid fever except through the milk they drink and the city authorities look after the milk. The city authorities also isolate all sufferers from contagious diseases. Epidemics are nipped in the bud and they are not allowed to spread. Food stuffs in all civilized communities are kept under glass cases and windows are screened from flies. That fact alone probably cut the death rate in every city from thirty in a thousand to twenty. In a big city in England years ago babies used to die like flies. The mayor of the city was greatly concerned about this infant mortality. He was a wealthy man and he offered a reward of from five to ten dollars to every mother who succeeded in keeping her baby alive for one year. That little act reduced the infant mortality in that town fifty per cent and produced hundreds of sturdy citizens who but for the thought of one man would have perished miserably in their infancy. If you take a family where there are eight children of normally healthy parentage and those children are given plenty of fresh air, good food, soap and water and scientific attention in case of sickness, the whole bunch of them in all probability will grow to maturity without the loss of a single life, while a family that is raised in dirt and squalor, where the mother is indifferent and hygiene and sanitation unknown, will lose half its members before their tenth birthday. In such a family however, there will be one or two probably that will develop extraordinary resisting powers to disease, for individuals and races vary in their susceptibilities to bacterial disease, owing probably to some inherited constituent in the blood. The blood of these persons will be found to contain plenty of healthy leucocytes, capable of overwhelming any diabolical disease bug that happens to get into the system. These people enjoy what we call natural or hereditary immunity. They are the lucky guys. Cleanliness is the twin brother of health and godliness, dirt the twin brother of disease and death. Don't take Methuselah's age too seriously. The old Biblical writers had a peculiar way of measuring time, and if a man in those days ever succeeded in living to be seventy years of age (and mighty few ever did) he generally called it seven hundred, for few people knew how to count, and those who could generally lost count. Remember there was no registration of births and deaths in those days, no vital statistics were kept, and Daniel or Dinah as the case may be, that sleeping porch would not have helped Methuselah much, for on inquiry I find that Methuselah had a sleeping porch, and Billy the Goat informs me that while he (Methuselah) was wandering around it one night in a dream (a very bad dream that had been superinduced by eating cucumbers, bologny and soft shell crabs) he fell off the porch and broke his neck. If you would live long and enjoy life, eat only those things that agree with you, and eat only that which is nourishing and of good quality; sleep not less than eight hours in a well-ventilated room; get as much outdoor exercise as possible; don't overwork or overloaf; worry as little as possible; see that water and milk are absolutely pure, and if uncertain on that score, boil them. Keep your feet dry, your head cool, be temperate in all things, keep your home and body clean and especially keep your teeth clean and have the dentist overhaul them once a year, for an abcess at the root of a tooth (and most people have one or more) is one of the most fruitful sources of disease. Have plenty of antiseptics and disinfectants about the home. Have your doctor overhaul you once a year whether you need it or not. You do that with your teeth if you are sensible, and as the mouth is but a small portion of a body that is filled with the most delicate machinery that is liable to get out of order, think how much more necessary it is to have the entire body overhauled. The day will come when the health of a nation will be its first care. Every physician will be a government official, and medical attendance will be free, except of course for the yearly sum we shall all pay for health insurance. In that day there will be no poor people dying for the want of proper medical treatment as thousands die today, and there will be no jollying sick people along with a view to getting something out of them. In that day all the forces of science will be directed towards the prevention rather than the cure of disease. We are headed in that direction right now, for we are getting sensible enough to know that disease prevention though less profitable to the doctors is more profitable for us.

NEWTON, COLO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am sixteen years old, blue eyes, brown hair, weight one hundred and twenty-two pounds, am five feet two inches tall and of German nationality.

I live on a large farm twelve miles west of Kansas. We have two farms twelve miles apart. We call them "Idalia" and "Newton." My oldest brother and my youngest sister and myself stay at the Newton ranch, most of the time, while my parents and the rest stay at the Idalia ranch. Our nearest railroad is twenty-five miles distant.

Colorado is said to be a dry country. This year we have had lots of rain. Our crops are fine. I can do most every kind of house work and also outside work. I am helping them out in the hay-field now days. I do not like to help very well, as I think girls should work in the house and learn to keep their homes clean.

I like to go to school. I think it is fine for people to have a good education. Cousins, do not lay aside your school books and get married. There is plenty of time to think of that when you are older. How many of you like music? I do but cannot play anything. I have Uncle Charlie's song book and also poem book, they surely are nice. I think the poems entitled "How Pop Played Santa Claus" and "When Father hangs a Picture on the Wall," will drive the blues away for anybody.

Girls do not think that you can win respect from men, by being "fast," for you cannot. It is very wrong to let the boys kiss you and call you pet names, till after you are engaged.

Cousins, let us do all we can for the poor shut-ins. I am writing to eleven of them.

Your cousin, GOLDA ARMKNECHT.

You are quite right Golda, a girl should keep the house clean. It came as an awful shock to me to find out that lots of girls don't know even how to sweep and dust a room properly, let alone cook. I know more than one girl who knows nothing of giving a house a thorough, drastic, weekly cleaning. In New York there is a terrific fight all the year round with roaches. They don't bother you in the winter but in the spring and summer they come out by the millions. Once we had an Irish Goat and Maria told her to keep her eye skinned for roaches, but the young lady paid no attention to them though they had begun to get as thick as flies around a molasses barrel. Then Maria swept down on her like an avalanche, and told her if she didn't keep the roaches under control she would have to get out: "Ah shure," said our Hibernian Goat, "I won't fuss with them now, but youse just wait until summer time comes and there is a million of them and then bedad I'll start in and kill the whole bunch of them off at once." You will probably think that's fiction but it isn't. Most girls know how to give a room a superficial cleaning, a little sweeping and dusting, but when it comes to going into corners, running a vacuum cleaner, pulling everything out of place so as to get behind and under, and swabbing every bit of woodwork and floor space with a kerosene mop, they don't know what it all means. A young married woman told me, apparently with great pleasure and pride that she did mighty little cleaning and fussing around her home, and said she with a laugh: "My husband writes on the dusty windows and mirrors 'Lazy,' 'Dirty' and 'Slob.'" She thought it was a great joke but I'll tell you how the joke ended. One day he packed his trunk and got out and disappeared. I congratulate him on his good sense. People who glory in being slobs have no right to expect anyone to be willing to share their dirt with them. Keep up your house cleaning Golda, and let the men look after the hay-field. Girls who are fast are not trying to win respect from men or anything else. When girls are fast they have lost their self respect and when you lose your self respect you lose everything. All that the swift girl is after is attention and what she calls a good time. She gets what she is looking for, and believe me she pays a frightful price for it, for the wages of sin is death and the average life of the girl who goes the pace is only five years, and most of that five years is spent in suffering and misery. Now Golda, let me question you about that very extraordinary sentence in your letter where you say: "It is very wrong to let the boys kiss you and call you pet names till after you are engaged." Great Scott child what do you mean by that? Do you really mean that it is all right to kiss a girl and call her pet names after she has become engaged? If that is the case I pity the poor fellow who becomes engaged to you. Believe me he'll have a sorry time of it. The Goat says you meant that a girl should not kiss a fellow or permit any familiarities until she is engaged to him. I hope that is what you really mean, Golda. Make men respect you girls. Most men are willing and ready to be respectful, but if a girl holds herself cheap of course the men will hold her cheap too. It is the girl that enforces respect that men seek in marriage. Men are always on the lookout for easy mark girls but never with any intention of putting wedding rings on their fingers. I am pleased to know Golda, that you are doing so much for the shut-ins, and I wish to heaven there were more like you.

ESKDALE, COLO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Would you allow a little American girl to join your merry circle. I am fourteen years old, five feet three inches tall, weigh ninety-eight pounds, have blue eyes, black hair and light complexion. I live on a farm of three hundred and twenty acres that is quite a large farm, we raise wheat, corn, oats and so forth. We live in one mile of a schoolhouse. They hold Sunday school in it every Sunday. I belong to the Methodist Episcopal church in Fort Morgan, Colo., and also the L. T. L. and Libety Bell Bird Club of Ft. Morgan. I have three sisters and four brothers. One of my brothers are married and has two little girls, named Edith and Fern. I go to school at Ft. Morgan and am in the sixth grade. I like to cook and play the organ and crochet. I would like to have the songs. "It's a Long, Long Ways to Tipperary" and "The Baggage Coach Ahead."

I have taken COMFORT for over a year and enjoy reading the letters from young people.

I would like to exchange scenery post-cards with COMFORT readers, as I love to look at sceneries.

With best wishes to Uncle Charlie and COMFORT readers. Your friend, RUTH CREECY.

I am tickled to bits Ruth, to have you join our magic circle. I'm glad you have such a nice, large farm, and put it to such good use. I'm more than interested in one of the things you raise. You tell us that you raise wheat, corn, oats and so forth. I've heard of wheat, corn and oats, and now I would like to get acquainted with the so forth crop, if you would tell us something about it. That crop is a new one on me. Is it a winter or a summer crop, Ruth, and do you harvest it with a reaper, a scythe or a pair of scissors? Is it used for feeding stock or do you convert it into breakfast food for millionaires? The Goat is quite excited about the so forth crop and says that you mean you raise wheat, corn, oats and other things along that line. I'm horribly disappointed. I was in hopes you had discovered some new edible that would be a welcome change, and add a little variety to the bran and whisk broom diet that Maria and the Goat chew up for breakfast nearly every morning of their lives. So you live in one mile of the schoolhouse. That must be a big schoolhouse if you live in one mile of it. Better say live within one mile of the schoolhouse, or one mile from the schoolhouse. What is the L. T. L. of which you are a member? The Goat says he thinks it is the Ladies' Temperance League. If you did not belong to it, I might think it was the Loafer's Tranquility League. The Goat thinks it is possible that L. T. L. might mean Lost Tramps Located, Loving Thoughts League, Lady's Tooth Laundry or something like that. Sorry you didn't enlighten us. I'm glad to see you have a bird club in Fort Morgan. The birds will soon become extinct unless somebody takes an interest in them and saves them from cats and pot hunters. One of my brothers is married, Ruth, not one of my brothers are married. Ruth informs us she likes to cook and play the organ. I suppose her idea in cooking the organ was to give us a feast of music. Thank you Ruth we will take our music uncooked, though maybe a fried organ would sound better than some of the uncooked ones I've heard. Let us know the next time you cook the organ Ruth, so we can all take a squint through the kitchen window when you have it on the stove. Young girls should not sing morguey songs of the "Baggage Coach Ahead," type. When you sing, sing something bright, cheerful and worth while. Directly I got

Little Teeth and Little Toothbrushes

By Mrs. Elizabeth Atwood

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE moment you see a tiny white speck in baby's mouth protruding from a rather inflamed little gum, brush it!

It is a tooth, baby's first tooth, and from his very first tooth on through his first set and then the youngster's second or permanent teeth, keep every one of them thoroughly brushed.

Of course you do not brush baby's first tooth with a real tooth-brush—at least it is to be hoped you do not—not even the softest and finest camel's-hair brush will do for this. Baby's first teeth must be kept clean with a tiny bit of linen rag or a bit of medicated or antiseptic absorbent cotton, then the bit of rag or little dab of cotton is thrown away and a new piece used when next the little tooth is "brushed."

Never wait for baby to get a number of teeth before cleaning them, begin with the first one. Use only water that has been boiled and only a soft rag or cotton until baby has several teeth in a row. Now is the time to use a very small brush of the softest camel's hair, because there are now little spaces between the teeth which must be cleaned. But at this early age do not use any sort of tooth wash or polish, paste or anything of that sort. Stick to the water that has been boiled. To this add a little milk of magnesia, about a teaspoonful to a cup of water. Better still, make it up fresh from time to time by adding two or three drops to a tablespoonful of water. Dip the camel's-hair brush in this and clean the youngster's teeth. It will not do any harm if baby swallows a little.

Pretty soon the baby will begin to eat a few solids, or semi-solids. Now is the time to keep right after his teeth. Brush them the first thing in the morning before he has eaten anything, and again at night after he has had his supper. By doing this in the morning you clean out anything that may have accumulated during the night and this prevents it from being carried into the stomach with the food. At bedtime the cleaning leaves his mouth wholesome and antiseptic throughout the night. No matter how clean the little one's mouth may seem, remember that there are all sorts of spaces and wrinkles and crevices between, in and around the teeth in which food and various things may find lodgment. Remember, too, that a child is forever putting things in his mouth, so that many things harmful to the child may lodge in the mouth and teeth unless they are cleaned.

A little stiffer brush may be used when the child is three years old. When he is five, begin to teach him to care for his teeth himself. But please do not make the mistake so many mothers do which is fatal to their children's teeth, that of thinking that because the little one brushes them they are quite clean. Look after them yourself and make sure they are clean.

Now a cute little brush hung on a little hook where the child can reach it, is necessary. By teaching the youngster that it is fun to brush his teeth he will not grow up to think it a disagreeable duty to be shirked whenever mother isn't looking. Make him think it is fun. Brush your own teeth with him at the beginning. Have a tooth-brushing race with him. Some very mild tooth powder or paste may now be used. If the child is trained to think it fun to brush his teeth he will get in the habit of doing it always, and then he will have a cleanly-mouth insurance all his days, as the habit will stick.

Examine the child's mouth at least once a week. Do it carefully, look in behind the teeth. Tiny decayed spots may start away back out of sight. No matter if they are the first teeth and other ones will soon come, keep the first teeth just as clean, just as free from decayed spots as though they were permanent. Sometimes a second tooth pushing its way out through the place where a first tooth was, which was decayed, will result in decaying the second tooth because some of the little germs or animal and vegetable parasitic growths will adhere to the second tooth and make trouble.

So many mothers boast with great pride that baby has a tooth. That is nothing much to boast about. Of course baby will have a first tooth. Nature attends to that, then nature stops and mother must step in and keep the little teeth as spotless and clean and healthy as they were when good Mother Nature gave them to baby. If your baby's teeth are just as clean and whole when he loses his first ones as they were when he cut them, then mother may boast, and with every right.

Remember that by keeping your children's teeth clean you are preserving their health, you are greatly lessening the dangers of impaired eyesight, for this frequently results from bad teeth, as years of carefully kept school medical examinations have proven.

When baby has become a big healthy romping child with a goodly supply of second or permanent teeth, keep a more strict watch over them than ever, if that is possible. It doesn't take half as much of mother's time as it sounds. Ten minutes once a week will do for examination. Then if there is a speck, off to the dentist. At that time the work will be slight, there will be no pain, the little decayed spot will be cleaned out and a white composition filling put in and that danger will be stopped. But with careful watching, careful cleaning and the ability to make the children keep their teeth brushed twice a day, there will be little danger of decayed teeth.

Never allow the child to go to bed without brushing his teeth, and if he has eaten candy before retiring, see to it that the cleaning is doubly thorough. By this time a fairly stiff brush may be used without danger.

It is really advisable to have the child clean his teeth after every meal, just a light brushing will do if the morning and night cleaning is thorough. Brush the upper teeth from the gums downward and the lower teeth from the gums upward. Naturally this takes the foreign matter away from the junction of the gums and teeth. When it gets in there and decays, the dangerous Riggs' disease may set in, the gums shrink and the teeth become loose. Brush the crowns with a rotary motion.

Teach the youngsters how to use dental floss and teach them to always use it if they get something in their teeth that the brush will not remove, such as berry seeds and the like.

Sometimes illness will cause teeth to decay even with care, but the dentist can remedy this if the first sign of decay is watched and the damage repaired. On the other hand, unclean teeth will cause illness, prevent the children from becoming robust and do far more damage than most mothers realize.

Dip the tooth-brush in boiling water once a week. Do not use the same tooth-brush after it becomes ragged and the bristles loose or soft. Better get the less expensive sort and then buy new ones more frequently. A tooth-brush that will drain well when rinsed is best, this has rather wide spaces between the rows of bristles. Rinse out the mouth every time after brushing the teeth.

The importance of all this can never be exaggerated. The dangers from neglecting the teeth are many and great. Not only should every mother know this, but she should make her children know and understand it. Tell the girls they will never be beautiful unless they keep their teeth clean. Tell the boys they will never grow up strong and manly unless they do this. It will all help you to give them the priceless habit of keeping their teeth clean all through life.

Hair Growth and Other Beauty Secrets

By Miss Valeska Suratt

The Famous Self-Made Beauty of the American Stage

THE VERY same problem I solved for myself, I have solved for thousands of my hair-afflicted sisters—the problem of actually forcing hair to grow. It is accomplished; and as a result, I am known as the only woman on the American Stage who wears no switches, puffs, wool rolls or other hair make-shifts. I have never known anything but the formula given below to produce satisfactory results.

This formula requires but a few moments to mix at home, and it makes over a pint or over two dollars' worth of the best hair-grower you can ever obtain. You also see the great economy in using this formula. Mix together one-half pint of alcohol, a half pint of water (or a full pint of bay rum instead of the water and alcohol, if you prefer) and one ounce of beta-quinol. Then your hair-grower is ready to use. Any druggist will supply you with the beta-quinol for fifty cents.

This will stop your hair from falling and force your hair to grow vigorously, as it invigorates the hair roots and brings the hair back to its youthful health. Use this formula and nothing else.

Wrinkle Question Answered

It will be one of the happiest periods of your life when your mirror begins to tell you the story of vanishing wrinkles. It is remarkable indeed what a tremendous difference may be produced in your appearance of age by the use of this simple formula, to be mixed at home in a few moments. It is so inexpensive, too, that a woman who refuses to try it, cannot complain that she has not had the opportunity to get rid of lines of age, crow's feet, sagging of flesh and wrinkles. Mix two ounces of eptol with half a pint of water and one tablespoonful of glycerine. This makes an adorable, satiny cream. Use it liberally. You can obtain the eptol from your druggist for fifty cents. This cream will give your face a girlish freshness nothing else can give.

An Adorable Complexion

I can assure you that the simplicity and ease of the proper method of beautifying the skin are really astonishing. An illustration of what can be done to the skin is shown by the result of my following formula: Simply mix two tablespoonfuls of glycerine in a full pint of water and add one ounce of zintone, which any drug store can furnish you for fifty cents. This cream should be used on the hands, arms, face and shoulders, liberally, every day. This quickly turns a skin, previously muddy, sallow or spotty, into one of exquisite loveliness, pure in its tint, spotless as a lily, soft as velvet. Use it generously and every day faithfully, and you will be grateful you followed my suggestions.

Hair and Scalp Cleanser

Keeping the hair and scalp clean is absolutely essential to hair health. Here is the most remarkable cleanser I have ever known for the purpose: a mixture of a teaspoonful of eggol in half a cup of hot water. As it contains no alkali whatever, it actually dissolves all fatty accumulations, and dandruff completely disappears. It cannot be surpassed as a cleanser. It is also economical, since you can obtain enough eggol for twenty-five cents at any drug store to supply you for a dozen or more shampoos.

To Remove Superfluous Hair

Visible superfluous hair on a woman's face or body is hideous, and it is inexcusable, because so easily and thoroughly removed, at least it becomes so by using the following, which never fails: You moisten the hairs to be removed with sulfo solution. You see the hair dissolve away in quite a remarkable manner, and you then wash it off. The skin is left clear, soft and unmarked. Another splendid feature is that it can be used on the tenderest skin, or any part of the body, with perfect safety. It can be obtained at any drug store for one dollar. Ordinary depilatories burn off the hair and leave a red or irritated spot where applied. But instead of burning off the hair and injuring the skin, no matter how tough, sulfo solution dissolves the hair and is a positive benefit to the skin. With the fashions as they are at present, a perfect hair-remover is a positive necessity to the woman who is particular about her appearance.

Splendid for Blackheads

You can get rid of blackheads in a few minutes by sprinkling some neroxin on a sponge made wet with hot water and rubbing the face with it. It is the only real blackhead remover I ever used. Neroxin will cost you fifty cents at the drug store.

Extraordinarily Fine Face Powder

There is much complaint about face powders being much too chalky. That is why I had a powder made after my own formula, called "Valeska Suratt Face Powder." It is the utmost in powder loveliness, exquisite in fineness and smoothness, delicate in scent, free from chalkiness, and practically invisible. It is now obtainable in drug and department stores for 50c. in white, flesh and brunette tints.

For Perspiration in Armpits

You can at once relieve that excessive and unnatural armpit perspiration by the simple use of hydrolized talc. You can obtain this at any drug store for 50c. It will at once remove all odor of perspiraton and other body odors and prevent the soppy condition under the arms. It will save you from embarrassment and save your garments as well.

Miss Suratt has instructed her secretary to obtain for you any article mentioned above, and necessary for making up any of her beauty formulas, if for any reason you have any difficulty or delay in getting them from any drug or department store. In such case simply send your name and address with the price to "Secretary to Valeska Suratt," Suite 416 Thompson Bldg., Chicago, mentioning the articles you want.

How About Repairs

HAVE you a neat little row of useful bottles and jars on your toilet table?

And are you ever so careful about a daily bath and a nightly complexion scrub, and the diligent use of your tooth-brush?

I hope you can say yes to all these queries, for while I do not want you to be all wrapped up in thoughts of your personal appearance—oh, no, indeed—I do want you to take the very best possible care of yourself that you may always look every bit as pretty as you were meant to be before you neglected your skin and let a discouraging crop of blackheads settle down there, or got to treating your hair in a most careless fashion unil it grew thin in protest, and fell out in handfuls, and became dry and faded. Oh, you see, I know some of you have done these things, for your letters tell me so!

But, besides the regular care which complexion, and hair, and eyes, and teeth, and finger nails must all receive if they are to look their best, there is another way of keeping yourself young and fresh, which you must not neglect.

PROPER POSITION FOR DEEP BREATHING EXERCISES.

Our sewing-machines, our automobiles, our furniture, our houses, all have almost regular periods of needing repairs. Your body and minds need to go to the repair shop even more regularly! They tire out, break down, wear out.

Then wrinkles come, and worry lines, and faded skin and hair, and dull, lack-luster eyes. But you can keep all these ills at bay by giving a few minutes to "repairs" every day, with a longer period at more extended intervals, if work or worry have been heavier than usual.

And it's such an easy matter—no long program of this to do and that to do, but just a shutting of your bedroom door on the rest of the world, the lowering of a shade to keep out the brightness of the day, the opening of a window to let in a current of fresh cold air, and then—fifteen minutes or half an hour on your pillow, with a blanket about you if the day is cool.

Of course you will take off shoes, corsets, and any garment which can bind you in the slightest. Indeed you will be sensible if you slip out of all your day things and into a pair of loose pajamas.

Close your eyes gently, curve up the corners of your mouth (your temples will relax involuntarily), and, breathing deeply and regularly, lie perfectly relaxed and still.

"But you can't sleep in the daytime?" Oh, I don't care. Sleep if you can; but, if you can't, rest! Only don't let your mind stray to one single worry or responsibility. Think of happy things only, and if happy things aren't happening, then think of the ones you would like to have happen. Thus will the lines disappear from your face; and eyes and mouth grow sweet and soft, and good to look upon.

When you've had a hard week or two, for one reason or another, do as a little friend of mine does, and stay in bed for two days (only, she makes it a week!) living on nothing but milk—a glass and a half every hour, carefully "chewed" before swallowing. You will be refreshed and beautified by these brief repair times.

And when there is a party to come off at which you want to look your best, take a half hour of "repairs" in the afternoon, and as soon as you jump up from your nap stand by the open window and practise deep breathing for two or three minutes.

To open up the lungs and make it easy to take very deep breaths, indeed, raise the arms on a level with the shoulders, then curve them so that the finger-tips almost meet in front, still on a level with the shoulders. Keep the arms stiff in this position, and breathe in slowly through your nose (not your mouth), then exhale the breath very slowly indeed.

Going into the repair shop this very day? I'm glad!

Answers to Questions

Jacksonville, Ill.—Just ask at your drug-store for peroxide of hydrogen and for toilet ammonia. To destroy superfluous hair, dampen growth one day with peroxide, letting dry on, the next day with ammonia. Keep this up until the hairs dry up and fall out. It is a slow process, but varies with different people. I am sorry the rules of this department prevent my replying by mail, as requested, but hope this answer will do as well.

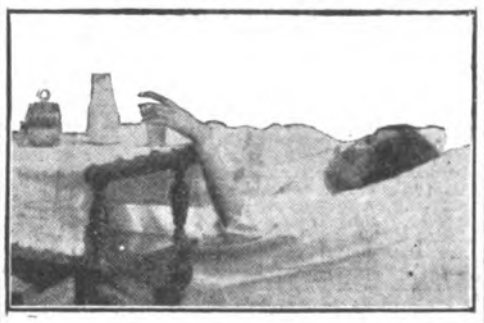
Daisy.—In taking the milk diet, the milk should be sweet, and unskimmed. The fresher and richer, the better. In skimmed milk, the fattening qualities have been largely removed. When you have finished taking the milk diet, go back, at first, to but one meal a day—dinner at night, taking milk until three or four o'clock, as before. Then take milk in the morning, for a week, a glass and a half an hour till about eleven o'clock, with lunch at one o'clock, dinner at night, drinking two or three glasses of water during the afternoon. The next week drop your milk altogether, if you want to, eating three well-selected meals a day, avoiding fried foods, always, cutting out too many sweets, having your meats roasted, broiled or boiled, your potatoes baked, boiled or mashed, and eating plenty of vegetables and fruits. Drink, then, eight to ten glasses of water a day, but not at meals.

Pet.—Perspiraton of the face can be lessened by careful eating, and cool clothing. If one eats quite heartily, and is rather fleshy, the face is apt to perspire. Take a daily bath, and finish with a cool spray or shower, except on the days when you are not feeling well, when, of course, avoid cold water but do not omit the bath, seeing that water and room are warm, and that you are not exposed to the slightest chill. Powder after the bath, shaking on talcum generously and using pads of absorbent cotton to go over the surface of the skin gently. Keep on light diet in hot weather, and at all times eat plenty of fruits and see that bowels are kept open daily. As to the large bust, dieting is your best friend, as well as in connection with the excessive perspiration. Exercise will help to reduce the bust—there is nothing which "rubbed on" will materially decrease size, and you should puchase a brassiere and wear over your corset to hold the bust firm. All department stores and mail-order houses carry them. A brassiere, as you know, is a boned or strapped corset cover which fits tightly over the bust, and is of heavy enough material to keep the bust perfectly firm. One way to reduce the bust is to purchase rubber sheeting wide enough to extend above and below bust, and long enough to wrap around the body. Then fasten this strip tight around body and over bust, fastening overlapping ends together with adhesive tape. This induces perspiration of the bust, and perspiration always breaks down fat and reduces it. Here is an exercise for you, but the main thing you need is a cutting down of the amount of food taken and the leaving off of all sweets, fats, cereals, butter, milk, cream, potatoes, rice and other fat-producing foods.

Exercise to Reduce Bust

Standing with heels together, chin up, chest out, raise the arms to a level with the shoulders, and extend them straight out in front of the body, palms facing each other, elbows perfectly stiff. Now throw the arms quickly and vigorously back as if trying to make them touch in the middle of the back. Be sure not to let them fall below the shoulder line, and do not bend elbow. Throw them forward, back, forward, back. Do this rapidly, breathing in as they are close together, and exhaling as you throw them apart each time.

Laura.—That was a very nice letter, and indeed it did not tire me—it interested me. There is no reason in the world why you should not weigh as much as you want to. The directions given in COMFORT for the milk diet apply perfectly to your case, and I hope you will follow them conscientiously. Indeed you do not need to go to bed—you may go about your usual work without any change, except that you must cut out solid food and take the milk as directed. You should gain from one to three pounds a week, and improve in every way. You may stop your exercises while on the diet. As a matter of fact, you ought to gain even on an ordinary diet, for you sound like quite a healthy young woman. The matter, no doubt, is that you are eating the wrong kinds of foods or those that are difficult of digestion—fried potatoes, vegetables cooked in grease instead of being boiled in quantities of water, thoroughly drained and seasoned—and probabaly fried meats, as well as a good deal of ham and pork, etc. Then, how about hot biscuits, and cake and pie? All bad for you, my dear! Not that a small amount of cake will hurt the ordinary person, but rich preserves and cake, or pie, every day, will do deadly deeds to even the best-intentioned stomach. Eat plenty of fruits, apples raw or baked or in apple-sauce form; baked pears, grape fruit, oranges, stewed prunes or figs, pineapple (excellent for you), and if you have lots of home-canned fruits, they will be all right for you provided they are not preserves or made very sweet. Fresh fruits are always better, however. Eat onions, spinach, beets, string beans, and every other vegetable you can secure. For breakfast omit meat and potatoes—probably you do—and eat fruit, cereal with cream, crisp toast, and soft boiled, soft poached, or scrambled eggs. Drink quantities of water through the day, and see that the bowels are kept thoroughly open, even if you have to resort to special exercises or to more walking in the open air. Drink the juice of a lemon in a glass of cool water—without sugar—every morning a half hour before breakfast. All this advice is for the time when you are not on the milk diet—but I hope that you will go on milk right away and keep it up until you have gained eighteen or twenty pounds. You can! How does that sound?



Bright Eyes.—Lemon juice in water is only a "good reducer" in so far as it acts on the liver and makes it do its work better, so that the food is more completely assimilated. Probably you need to cut down your diet and alter it somewhat. See answer to "Pet" for exercise to reduce bust. Here is one for the abdomen:

To Reduce Abdomen

Lying on the back, in nightgown or other loose clothing, raise the right leg, without bending the knee in the slightest, until it is at right angles with the body. Then lower it very slowly indeed, as if it were being held back. Repeat ten or fifteen times; then go through the exercise with the left leg; then with both together. You will find it difficult, if not impossible to raise the leg, at first, until it is perpendicular, but this will come with faithful and daily practise, and every ten minutes will be doing its work on your abdomen. This is also an excellent exercise for constipation.

E. L. B.—See answer to "Daisy." You should be able to buy almond milk at your druggist's.

M. E.—I cannot tell from your description just what is the matter with your hair, but judge the little oil cells are clogged. You should give your hair a thorough shampoo as soon as you read this, and thereafter shampoo it once in two weeks, being very careful to rinse many, many, many times until every particle of soap is out of the hair. Of course you will not rub soap on the hair, but use a homemade soap jelly such as I have given many times in these columns. Then brush your hair every night, one hundred strokes—fifty to each half—and massage the scalp for a few minutes with the fingers. Leave the hair down for the night, either loose or very loosely braided. To massage, place the finger-tips against the scalp, and without lifting them move the skin back and forth on the skull. Do not let fingers rub back and forth, but hold them firmly against scalp. I should not pull out the little hairs. The reason the "pimples" on the scalp get well when you pull them out is because an outlet for the matter which clogs the pimples is thus made.

A COUPLE OF DAYS IN BED ON THE MILK DIET WILL DO WONDERS FOR A TIRED FACE AND BODY.

Gray Eyes.—For five feet, five inches, the correct weight for one of small bones is one hundred and forty pounds, but this is too much for the girl of larger bone. If you are only sixteen, one hundred and twenty pounds would probably be a very good weight for you. You should have a slim bust—thirty-four is all right—and your waist should be not more than ten inches smaller than your hips. The dark circles under your eyes, left by your long illness, will disappear as you gradually grow stronger. Be very careful to eat nourishing food, to drink plenty of water, to see that the bowels move daily, and not to let yourself get chilled at any time. Keep your ankles always warm and well-covered, and wear warm underwear coming to the ankles, in the winter. More illness and other troubles come from getting the feet chilled than most people imagine. Read what I have to say this month about "repairs." Just after an illness you should get at least an hour's rest a day on the bed—and even more if you can—a rest in the morning, and one in the afternoon, and go to bed early at night. Here's a wish for early roses for your cheeks!

Violet.—For a too red complexion, look to your diet. You cannot bleach a red face—only one which is sallow or browned. Your digestion is probably not what it should be, and that would suggest that you have been eating too many sweets, fried foods and other food difficult of digestion. Read my answers to "Daisy," "Laura" and "Bright Eyes," and see if some of the advice does not fit you. To develop the bust, practise deep breathing exercises for at least fifteen minutes a day, and be careful always to stand or sit or walk with chest thrown out, and shoulders dropped. This will increase the apparent size of the bust. The exercise given "Pet" to reduce her fat bust will also develop a thin bust, for in the one case it burns up the fat, and in the other develops the muscle. Practise daily: This is also good for the arms. Using slightly heavy dumbbells would develop the arms, as the labor of lifting them so that the arm was perpendicular with the shoulder, then thowing them out on a straight line with the shoulder in front, then the same to the side, will develop the muscles.

Eveline.—Yes, you are over weight, for five feet ten inches—one hundred and fifty-four would be the correct weight, so you have twenty-six pounds to lose. Your bust should be about forty inches, and your hips the same. Your waist is smaller than it should be, so under no circumstances attempt to reduce it. Why, my dear, you would be all out of proportion. A twenty-eight inch waist, in these days, is considered a very good waist size, for nobody now thinks of squeezing up her waist as used to be done some years ago. So if you want to look up-to-date in figure, and not hopelessly "small-towny" as one of my girls says—though why one should object to looking like anything so nice and homey as a small town, I don't know—let your waist alone. It is too small, now! Your hip measure is about correct. Red rubber bands around the waist? Take them off at once! To make the eyebrows grow, rub in vaseline or olive oil nightly. You say this makes the hair fall out—it can't, my dear, but it may be that you rub so vigorously that you dislodge the hairs. Apply gently with a clean mucilage or paste brush. In the morning wash with hot soapy water. Yes, in using cold cream before powder go over the face with a cloth or pad of cotton and rub in the cold cream, at the same time wiping off the surplus or all that the skin will not absorb. With medium brown hair, dark blue eyes and fair complexion, you can wear most colors—blue, either dark or light, yellow or orange or brown, mahogany, olive green, wine color, dark gray (if your color is good), a reddish purple, dark pinkish tan, etc. To bleach the arms, beat the yolk of an egg until fluffy, then add a teaspoonful of olive oil, half an ounce each of glycerine and rosewater, twenty drops of tinctue of benzoin, and enough flour to make a paste. Spread this on the arms, then wrap with bands of surgical gauze, so that the paste will be kept on and the bedding saved from being soiled. Wear all night, and in the morning wash off with warm soapy water, rinse in warm water, then in cold. Repeat nightly for seven days. Nobody could tell you the ingredients of a powder by looking at it—it would have to be analyzed in a laboratory, so I cannot advise you as to the character of the powder you inclosed me. I am sorry.

Blockhead.—For large, blunt finger-tips, see that the nails are cut in a graceful oval, and kept in perfect condition. This will give the fingers an appearance of tapering. When washing the hands always compress and pull the finger-tips, and do the same when wiping them and any other time in the day that the hands are idle. This will help to alter their shape. To develop your arms and make them "large and plump," as you desire, perhaps you need to add a little more weight to the entire body. How about it? See answer to "Violet" for suggestions about developing the arms.

Miss C. H.—You weigh eight pounds more than the correct weight for your height if of small bones—one hundred and thirty. However, it may be that one hundred and twenty-five would be enough for you. Cut down, temporarily, on all sweet desserts—such as cake, candy, preserves—and on potatoes, rice and cereals. Eat, however, plenty of vegetables and fresh fruit—no fat meat, very little butter, milk or cream. See answer to "Pet" about reducing bust. It would not be possible for you to learn to marcel hair, without long training. It is difficult, and many good hairdressers do not attempt it.

Hilday B.—I am sorry I cannot offer to sell your depilatory to the other subscriber you mention. This would not be fair to those who pay money to advertise such articles in the columns of COMFORT, where all our readers may benefit by them. No magazine can help to sell articles to its subscribers except through its advertising colmuns. Do you see? Good luck to you!

Smiles.—You do not tell me your weight, so I cannot tell you whether you weigh too much. For your height, five feet, six inches, the weight should be one hundred and forty-three pounds, bust should be thirty-nine and hips the same, waist about ten inches smaller than the hips. I expect you eat too much at one meal. I notice you do not eat breakfast or supper, and I am afraid that at the other meal you eat too much, or supplement it with food between meals. I suggest you take a glass of water in which the juice of a lemon has been squeezed, an hour before breakfast—or even a half hour. For breakfast, eat an orange, some crisp toast (without butter) and a soft-boiled egg. Drink nothing with your meals, at any time. In the morning drink two glasses of water. For lunch eat some stewed tomatoes, some boiled onions, some corn, graham or whole wheat bread, some lean meat, and no dessert. Substitute any other vegetables except potatoes, rice, macaroni. For your supper, some crisp toast again, or bran muffins, a baked apple without cream, or some stewed prunes or figs. I am not suggesting much for supper, since you say you are in the habit of going without it. Drink three glasses of water in the afternoon, and two between supper and going to bed, but not within an hour after the meal. Do not eat more than one helping of any article of food at any meal, and not too generous a helping at that. On this regime you should decrease in weight and improve in health and strength. Freckles are sometimes obstinate and difficult to get rid of. Try this: but keep it out of the reach of children, as it is poison, if taken internally. And be careful not to get any in or near the eyes.

To Remove Freckles

One half ounce solution of ammonia, weak, one half ounce rose-water, one half ounce powdered borax, one quarter ounce glycerine, one half ounce bay rum. Distilled water, five ounces. Mix these ingredients—or have your druggist put up this formula for you. Use it carefully, for it is quite strong. If it irritates the skin, stop using it. Try it on the leg first to test its strength for your skin. To use, dampen freckled skin and allow to dry on at night.

SURGICAL FEATS WITH MAGNETS.—It is said that a French army surgeon has, with the aid of an extraordinarily strong electro-magnet, recently performed several successful operations without the use of an anesthetic. A casing of ferro-nickel surrounds the German bullet and the electro-magnet simply draws it out of the wounded man's body, as well as splinters of shells.

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasoline engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed.

Three Types of Power Plants

SINCE the advent of the automobile three types of engines or motor have been developed to a stage considered by many to be almost perfection. These are the gasoline, steam and electric motors. Many advantages are claimed for each type and the object of this article is to place the facts before the readers as viewed by the writer.

The Steam Engine

Almost everyone is acquainted with the make-up of the steam engine. In brief it necessitates a boiler, a fire for generating the steam and a cylinder for delivering the power. The cylinder contains a piston so arranged as to work from one end of the cylinder to the other. The opening of certain valves allows the steam under pressure to contact with one face of the piston thus forcing the piston to move across the cylinder. Steam under pressure then contacts with the opposite face of the piston and thus forces it back. The advantage of the steam engine is that the full pressure of steam generated in the boiler can be directed on the piston and thus start a heavy load easily from standstill. Because of the admission of steam from both ends of the cylinder, this engine is very flexible, can be run at slow speeds with much power, is noiseless, does not require a transmission and can be operated at very fast speeds.

The Electric Motor

Viewing the electric motor from a mechanical standpoint it forms an ideal powerplant for the automobile. The electric motor has but one moving part that being what is termed the armature and its shaft may be used to turn the machinery. The armature has a rotary motion and therefore may be run at high speeds without causing vibration. This motor will start itself by simply turning on the current, will start a vehicle from a standstill with considerable power and is easily controlled. The chief drawback of the electric motor for automobile use is that the current for turning over the motor must be taken from a battery carried in the vehicle. It does not require a great deal of running before

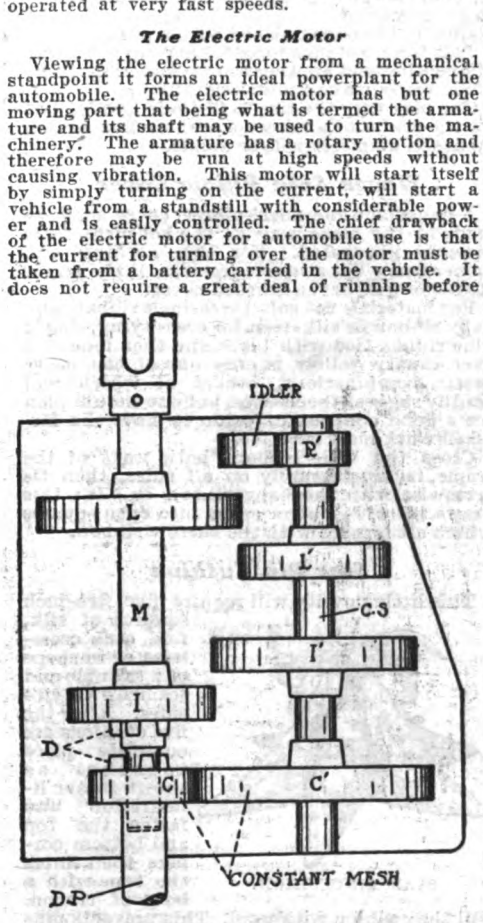

DIAGRAM OF THREE SPEED SELECTIVE TYPE, SLIDING GEAR TRANSMISSION.

This device consists of two parallel shafts—a main shaft, M, and a countershaft, C. S. The gears C'—I'—L'—R' are keyed to the countershaft and cannot be moved on the shaft. The mainshaft, M, is usually a square shaft and the gears, I and L can be slid along it. It will be noticed that the end of the main transmission shaft rotates freely in the end of the driving pinion. As the gears C and C' are permanently meshed, the power is first delivered to the countershaft and then to the mainshaft and thus to the wheels. The only time the road wheels are in direct connection with the engine is when the gear, I, is meshed with the one marked C. all current is taken from the battery and it is therefore necessary to recharge the same frequently. Charging stations are few and far between, a long time, experience and great care are required to recharge without injuring the battery, and the power is running down continually while in use.

Gasoline Engine

The chief fault of the electric motor is the necessity of using a storage battery while the chief objection to the steam engine is the use of the boiler. The objectionable features of these parts are space required, weight, and constant need of attention. Although not free of faults the gas engine is not restrained as the two types of power plants mentioned above. It requires no boiler or need the power be stored in reserve. The explosive mixture is made for each cylinder as needed and consequently the slower the engine is run the less fuel is used. The chief objectionable feature of the gas engine is that when running at high speeds some of the power is lost because of the rapidity in which the explosive charges are taken in. In other words the cylinder does not have time to draw in a full breath. Another point to be considered is that each explosive mixture can only develop a certain amount of power. At slow engine speeds a less number of explosive charges are taken in and consequently there is a loss of power.

The intention of the writer is to make clear that the gas engine is not an ideal power plant being the most powerful when operated at medium speed. At slow speeds and at high speeds its full power is not delivered. As stated above the gas engine has no reserve power and when additional power is needed it has to be obtained through the use of gears. Neither can the gas engine used in the automobile be run in a reverse direction and therefore, when it is desired to run the car in a reverse direction or deliver more power to the driving wheels it must be done by manipulating gears. This part of the automobile is referred to as the transmission. The only time when the driving wheels are directly coupled with the engine is when the gear shifting lever is placed in the position usually referred to as "high." When the car is operated in "intermediate, low or reverse" the road wheels are not directly coupled with the engine, but the power is being delivered to the wheels through gears in the transmission.

Now that you have heard of the objectionable features of the gas engine let us consider the advantages which it has over all others as a power plant for the automobile. To start the steam engine in the morning it is first necessary to light a fire under the boiler and wait until a certain pressure of steam has been generated. The electric motor does not have this objectionable feature but the battery is a constant care. The gas engine if turned over once or twice will start and only requires fuel to keep it running. Gasoline and oil can be purchased even in the country districts. When the ignited current is shut off everything becomes dead, so to speak, but instantly becomes alive by switching on the current and turning the motor over. This engine has been developed to a point far in advance of the other types and is in comparison much less in weight. Its many advantages for practical use have given it a long lead over the other two types.

Trouble with Low Grade Gasoline Worse in Cold Weather

More than one motorist has been surprised as the days have been growing colder to note that his car did not consume the usual amount of lubricating oil. This condition is not confined to any one make of car in particular but to all c · generally. If the motorist will but drain the oil from the crankcase of his motor he is apt to find that gasoline is mixed with the lubricant. This new difficulty is principally due to the present low grade of gasoline in use. The gasoline air mixture leaks past the pistons and rings during the compression strokes and when striking the cold crankcase condenses back to the liquid form. The question is apt to arise in one's mind, why was this condition not evident during the summer months since the present grade of fuel has been in use for some time? The answer is this. More complete vaporization of the gasoline took place in the summer due to the high surrounding temperature. The crankcase was also of a higher temperature as the fan was not continuously directing a volume of cold air on it. The same amount of gasoline and air mixture worked by the piston rings in warm weather as does at present but due to the warmth of crankcase and surrounding atmosphere the mixture was not allowed to condense back to the liquid state and was passed out of the crankcase breather in the form of vapor. At this time of year the lighter portion of the heavy fuel is burned and the unconsumed part is partly carried out with the exhaust gases while some of it works past the pistons and rings into the crankcase. Liquid gasoline in the crankcase thins the lubricating oil and also washes the oil off the cylinder walls, pistons and rings thus causing the motor to turn over hard and in some instances scores or cuts the cylinders. Naturally if an engine turns over hard and an electric starter is used considerable current is taken away from the storage battery.

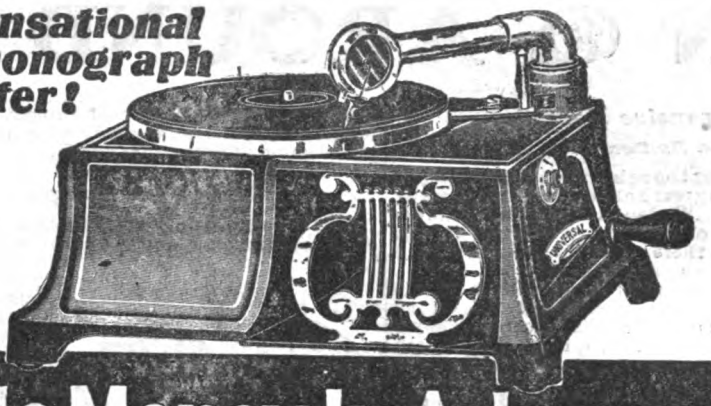
Regardless of the condition of cylinders or piston rings, it is impossible to prevent some of the mixture from leaking past the piston rings into the crankcase. It is plain then that it does not require a great while before a large amount of gasoline has collected in the crankcase. A motor which has been very economical in lubricating oil will be apt to show the effects of this condition sooner than any other. This condition is one over which the most experienced motorist or repairman has no control. The reason for bringing this matter to the attention of the motoring world is to instruct owners in the handling and care of their cars in cold weather and thus prevent damage being done.

The careful operator will always cover the radiator when leaving the car as it has been determined that there is a difference of about 200 degrees in temperature of a motor in the summer and winter. Closely watch the oil indicator and note whether or not the motor appears to be using the usual amount of oil or whether the crank case seems to be filling up. When either of these conditions are noticed drain off the oil and refill to about three quarters capacity with fresh oil.

Another matter which will bear watching is the running of the car with the carburetor dash control turned to the position which prevents the carburetor receiving all the air possible. Running the car with the choker shut or commonly referred to as the starting position will greatly assist in the filling of the crankcase with gasoline. The operator should be careful to adjust the carburetor according to the manufacturer's instructions. It may be well to have this work done by a carburetor expert if one is available. On a cold morning do not expect to start from a cold garage with the motor running smoothly without allowing the engine to warm up for a few minutes. Even then it may require a quarter of a mile of running, depending of course on the surrounding atmosphere, to get the motor warm enough to run smoothly. It cannot be expected that the throttle can be opened wide at once without the carburetor spitting and popping. If it is found necessary to place the carburetor control in the starting position do so, but bear in mind that you are assisting the gasoline to accumulate in the crankcase and so place it back to the open position as soon as possible.

Particular attention should be paid to the storage battery especially in cold weather. If the ignition current is taken from the storage battery and the battery is allowed to become weak, starting will be difficult due to the poor ignition spark and also because the battery does not produce sufficient current to rapidly turn over the engine. If the electric starter is used and the engine refuses to start after being turned over about 10 times, do not continue the cranking. Bear in mind that the cylinders are burning no gas and that a large amount of gasoline will be washed down into the crankcase. Get out and pour a little gasoline into the cylinders as a primer and then start the motor with the handcrank.

The majority of instruction books furnished with cars recommend the draining of oil from the crankcase once in every 2,000 miles. An authority on motors has recently determined that while the present grade of motor fuel exists far better results can be obtained by draining the old oil off and refilling with new once every 500 miles. The results obtained will well warrant the little care required to follow out the above suggestions.



Clear Vision

Mist and rain if allowed to settle on the windshield cause deceiving illusions which frequently result in serious accidents. There are many devices on the market which may be obtained at a trifling cost for the maintaining of a clear vision during stormy weather but in the absence of any of these a simple and inexpensive remedy is as follows: Mix equal parts of kerosene and glycerine and apply a fine film to the windshield glass with a brush. A glass so treated will shed water like a duck's back.

There's a Reason

Automobile designers have a good reason for placing each part in a certain position on the machine. Owners who study their machines are apt to wonder why the water pipe leading from the top of the engine to the top of the radiator is generally given an upward inclination. The reason is that water when sufficiently heated generates steam. If the pipe was level there would be danger of the steam gathering at the highest portions and materially interfere with the flow of water. On the other hand, when the pipe is given a slight upward inclination the steam will travel up the pipe to the radiator where it is cooled and condensed into water or passes into the atmosphere through the overflow pipe of the radiator.

scriptions to various splendid papers which we enjoy reading and appreciate sincerely even though we do not know who subscribed for them.

I have some lovely pen friends whom I hope to keep; some are dear old people; I have their names and addresses filed away to have a permanent record of their birthdays and I shall remember them that date with a letter or card as long as they or I live; bless the dear old folks! I love the young folks too, but venerate the old.

I feel sure some have believed me to be a long time in sending the few helps I promised, but if they could only know how very many have asked me for so many different helps I know their patience would be unending.

I am including herewith a few to our paper hoping to be of some service to so many others who have been of such splendid aid to me.

All who have asked for the Mexican beans (Frijoles—pronounced free-ho-leys—meaning beans) and may not have received them, I wish to state that I sent them; every one whose letter reached me asking for same I surely mailed promptly so they could plant for this season. They are a bush bean, good "Samps" or as green beans; have written several individually the Mexican way of seasoning and serving them and many have written me they cannot find one kind of the flavor I named so have sent them the label off of bottles or containers.

I am delighted with the many good letters, etc., but would be so pleased to have at least sender's names or initials and post-office address on post-cards and letters, etc., then I could let them know that same were received by me. Thanks to each who sent stamps and stamped envelopes.

Many inquiries have come asking about climate, crops, rain, etc., etc., and some of my letters not reaching addressee or theirs not reaching me, I feel there is no surer way than through the medium of this corner to answer every one.

Our rains—this year—began the 7th of July, sometimes little earlier, other years later. So we are now farmers for the next two to four months. Such lovely rains have come so far that we now have a green valley—the native wild grass being knee-deep to range stock all over and they are rolling fat. I often wonder if our valley does not look like "The Low Green Valley on the Old Kentucky Shore." We planted more than two acres of all sorts of vegetable seeds and so invite COMFORT staff and readers passing to call in this winter and I will serve them a pot of frijoles seasoned a la Mexican as also other Spanish dishes.

The climate is temperate; that is, short, mild winters,—December, January and February; spring (beautiful), is lovely and cool, March, April and May, though dry; summer rushes in with that beautiful auspicious month of wedding-bells and honeymoons, June, very pleasant until it warms up to a few days of almost torrid weather in July, cooling down with rains in August, then deliciously cool and enlivening enters autumn with September, October and November. Most years have had sufficient snow-fall in winter to put a good season in ground to start spring gardening and crops for the rainy season. As to homestead laws friends, please let me refer you to the United States for rules and regulations governing requirements, addressing the Department of The Interior, Phoenix, Arizona about any lands of this state and said laws; they are free for the asking and you should plainly state just what you wish to know.

We are not so scared over war as we were a month ago before so many U. S. soldiers arrived in our midst; we try to be content with our lot in life come what may: "It is better to whistle than whine."

Now, that our spring and summer are here we must cheer up and do our part in making the sunshine glad we enjoy the rains; without either our land would not be so beautifully carpeted with living green and all nature seems so glad. If we are not glad Nature's efforts must be in vain and E. W. W. says: "The wiser man shapes into God's plan, as the water does in the vessel." I like natural scenery; the sisters seem to have sensed this from the many lovely scenes they sent on post-cards, etc. I also like scenes of man's handywork, such as great buildings and in cities and on ocean shores one can see and note well directed energy, work and wisdom; it proves to me we are living in a busy world of large and grand undertakings, and rapid progress with Father Time; on every side is to be seen advancement and expansion; I like all this, but I like best of all the quietude of a country home and life.

Just an hour of city life brings me to the full realization of "Home Sweet Home" in the country.

Wishing Uncle Charlie and all our COMFORT staff and each sister an abundant shower of blessings and joys for the future, I am your COMFORT sister,

LILLIE D. ELDREDGE.

The Fallen Hero

REQUESTED

"He went to war in the morning—
The roll of the drums could be heard.
But he paused at the gate with his mother
For a kiss and a comforting word.
He was full of the dreams and ambitions
That youth is so ready to weave,
And proud of the clank of his sabre
And the chevrons of gold on his sleeve.

"He came back from the war in the evening—
The meadows were sprinkled with snow,
The drums and the bugles were silent,
And the steps of the soldier were slow.
He was wrapped in the flag of his country
When they laid him away in the mould,
With the glittering stars of a captain
Replacing the chevrons of gold.

"With the heroes who slept on the hillside,
He lies with a flag at his head,
But, blind with the years of her weeping,
His mother yet mourns for her dead.
The soldiers who fall in the battle
May feel but a moment of pain,
But the women who wait in the homesteads
Must dwell with the ghosts of the slain.

Inexpensive Novelties

What Can Be Done with Ribbon

HOW our thoughts fly to absent friends as the great holiday, Christmas, draws near. We long to send forth expressions of our loving thoughts, but as usual there arises the old question I wonder what I can make for——?

Many a woman who is beginning to puzzle over a long list should be able to decide on the making of some suitable gifts by copying some of the doilies, yokes, pillows, bags, etc., which have been given in this department in the past few months.

Any number of these things would make exceedingly pretty presents but the woman who can neither crochet, embroider, nor paint is often at a total loss to know just what to do especially when a slim purse must be made to do considerable. So for her especially have these hints for using ribbons and silk been prepared.

As is usual the dainty trifles which are really new, are always high in price as it is the idea rather than the material used, which is charged for. However if one takes the time and plans ahead many of these especially attractive little articles may be readily concocted at home of silk or ribbon on hand, or remnants at bargain prices can be purchased as one has the opportunity.

Ribbon Bedroom Slippers

These are the easiest things in the world to copy and are so pretty. Secure a pair of fleece or quilted satin soles of the proper size. A yard of three and one half inch soft ribbon and nine inches of elastic will be required for each slipper. Make a half inch casing along one edge of the ribbon for the elastic. Shur the opposite edge, arrange the fullness evenly all around and sew with fine close stitches to the sole. Finish the fronts with white narrow ribbon daisies or tiny rosebud.

RIBBON BEDROOM SLIPPERS.

The daisies can very easily be made by tying knots every two inches in baby ribbon. Then loop back and forth, tying tightly in the center, which should be finished with a little yellow embroidery silk, frayed out. The knots in the ribbon should be arranged to come in the center of each loop. Rose buds may be made by folding an inch ribbon or a piece of bias silk, coil or wind round and round, sewing securely. Sew a group of three together and back with loops of half inch green ribbon.

Another style ribbon slipper which can be easily made is just sort of a sandal. For this, one will need besides the soles, three yards of inch and a quarter ribbon. Cut off two seven-inch pieces, sew one end of each to either side of one sole at the instep, cross and sew the opposite ends of the ribbons to the sole near the toe, thus crossing these ribbons over the arch or front of the foot.

Sew a third ribbon to the center of the toe, this runs straight up the foot, finishing in a loop.

To the back of the heel attach a ribbon which ties about the ankle after passing through the loop on the end of the toe piece. Finish and hold the ribbons in place, by tying a bow over the crossing of the ribbons in front.

These suggestions for little personal remembrances combine daintiness simplicity and rapidity of execution.

Nothing more than the ability to sew neatly is needful, and the best part of it all is that each one of these articles is as useful as it is ornamental.

A New Bandeau

The fad of tying the hair down across the forehead is still as popular as ever with young girls. For everyday wear ribbons are used but these give place to dressier affairs for parties or dances. These bands are so becoming to most youthful faces, any young girl who enjoys good times would surely be pleased with a gift of this sort.

To copy the one shown two and one quarter yards of flat white ribbon wire will be necessary for the foundation. Cut this into three pieces, then cover each by winding with half inch satin ribbon fasten the ends together and cover with ribbon so the wire will not catch in the hair.

Now braid the three strands and finish the opposite end with a full rosette. If the ribbon for this is knotted every three inches and then folded back and forth so the knots will come in the center of each loop, it will be much prettier.

Any girl would surely be delighted with a pair of silk slippers or a bandeau of ribbon. Any young mother could hardly help liking a little heart-shaped baby-coat hanger, or a bib holder, while almost anybody welcomes a new pin-cushion, at least once a year.

Baby-Coat Hanger

This is a very dainty little affair made up of either blue or pink, and is a bit of work which can be done by any one who can do plain sewing.

HEART-SHAPED COAT HANGER.

For the frame one will need about 30 inches of wire, either the ordinary sort which can be purchased for a few cents at any hardware store, or large hat wire will do. This is covered before bending into shape, for which one will need five yards of inch wide satin ribbon. Fold in the center, satin sides out and run two rows of machine stitching the entire length to make a casing through which the wire is run. Fasten ribbon to one end of the wire and about four inches from the other end this piece being necessary for the hook. The ribbon being fulled on the wire creates little frills on either edge.

If wider frills are desired two and one half yards of four-inch ribbon can be used, folded lengthwise. Wind the hook with narrow ribbon and finish with a bow and long sachets.

Hanger No. 2 is made by simply covering one of the small wire hangers with twisted ribbon and sewing a full rosette at the base of the hook.

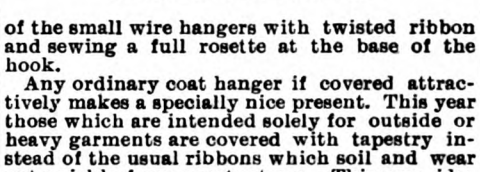
Any ordinary coat hanger if covered attractively makes a specially nice present. This year those which are intended solely for outside or heavy garments are covered with tapestry instead of the usual ribbons which soil and wear out quickly from constant use. This new idea is much more practical and a hanger, well padded covered with a rich deep-toned tapestry, comes near to being a joy forever, as such a covering will wear indefinitely. Among the best odors for sachets or to sprinkle on the padding of these hangers are pine, clover, lavender, cedar and lavender.

Reminder Tablet

Now that telephones are the rule rather than the exception a unique gift which can be very inexpensively and quickly made is a tablet of heavy water color paper. Seven sheets of paper measuring eight by ten inches will be needed.

Use white ink and write on the first—at the top—Sunday the day that is Blest.



Next comes—
Monday for Health.
Then—
Tuesday for Wealth.
Followed by Wednesday, the Best Day of all.
Thursday for Losses
And—
Friday for Crosses.
While Lastly is Saturday, No Luck at all.

While the ink is wet sprinkle with powdered gilt and shake off all which does not adhere.

Tie all the sheets together with a bright ribbon, after ruling a two-inch space down the left side of each sheet for telephone numbers.

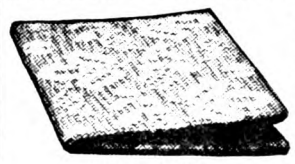
Bib Holder

This is a very good suggestion especially of use and value to a mother when away from home as by its use, a napkin can be readily made to do duty as a bib for a young child and will be quite as secure.

BIB HOLDER.

Ten inches of fine white tape, a piece of silk braid or a bit of ribbon and two garter fasteners are all that is necessary. An embroidered design of small French knot flowerets adds to the appearance of this useful little trifle.

Ribbon Handkerchief Case

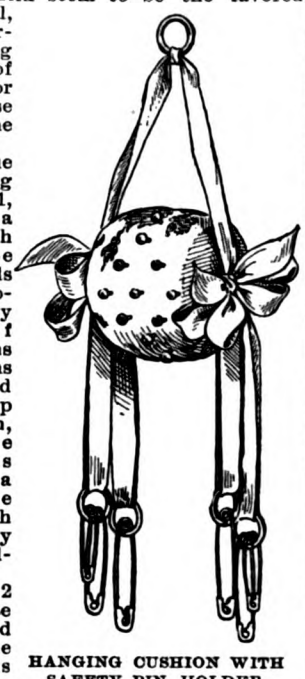


This handsome case requires two thirds of a yard of five-inch ribbon, and three and one half yards of one half inch ribbon. Weave the two shades of ribbon together for the outside. Sew the ends over two pieces of cardboard measuring five by five and one half inches, then line with the wide ribbon, basting in place. Hem the ends of the other piece of wide ribbon, place on the inside of the case to form pockets and overcast all edges together. Attach a ribbon for tying to the center of the back.

HANDKERCHIEF CASE.

Card Case

To send in place of a Christmas card to one who has need of it, what would prove more acceptable than a little card case.



CARD CASE.

This can be made very quickly, covered with any pretty bit of silk, satin or brocade, or lacking this a case similar to that illustrated can be made of a solid color covered on the outside with a piece of lace.

Pin Cushions

New odd cushions always make their appearance at this time of the year as they are always in demand.

Ribbons and silk seem to be the favored materials as usual, but for this purpose everything used should be of a good quality, or with actual use they soon become very shabby.

HANGING CUSHION WITH SAFETY PIN HOLDER. FIG. 1.

For the unique little hanging cushion Fig. 1, only a third of a yard of five-inch ribbon will be needed, two yards of half inch ribbon, one ivory ring, one half dozen safety pins and a few pins with colored heads. Seam up the wide ribbon, gather up the selvedge edges and fit over a cushion of the right size. Finish as is clearly shown in the illustration.

Hanger Fig. 2 is very delicate made of a third yard of light blue ribbon, two yards baby ribbon, twelve inches of half inch ribbon for hanging, four ivory rings, and some safety pins.

The ribbon for the foundation should be about four inches wide, fringe one end of this, sew the other end over a collar or bit of feather bone to keep it flat. Run the narrow ribbon through rings, fasten to the center of this, add ribbon for hanging and decorate with loops of the baby ribbon and tiny roses made of any bits of pink silk or chiffon which one happens to have handy.

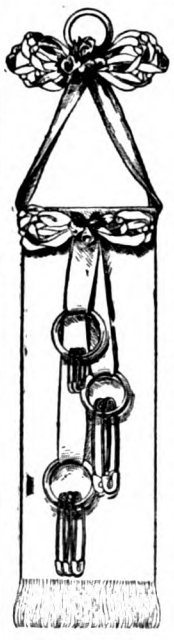


FIG. 2.

Sewing Conveniences

Today many of the most useful little sewing contrivances are quite gay and attractive, they are also disguised in the most surprising manner.

The new emeries especially will do credit to the best and prettiest of work baskets, for they come in all sorts of artistic shades some representing luscious strawberries, while others look like big raspberries which would melt in your mouth.

Radishes and carrots are also seen but perhaps the most realistic of all are the shiny brown chestnuts made of brown satin. The sides are of this, cut the size and shape of a nut and joined together with a piece of brown velvet. Finish the wove point side with a few long and short stitches with tan floss and the effect will be very much like the real thing.

Some of the most convenient sewing cases shown this year are really very clever combinations of two or three articles.

An illustration of this is a novelty particularly designed for the woman who is away from home.

It is really a combination sewing-bag, spool holder and needlecase.

The bag of silk is six by nine inches when complete and fitted on the inside with little pockets for buttons, hooks and eyes, thimble, etc.

To the bottom of the bag is attached a needle case with soft covers of cream canvas bound with satin ribbon. Six spools threaded on ribbons (three on each side of the back at the bottom) complete this article, which is rolled up over the spools when not in use and tied securely with the drawstrings.

Crocheted Necktie

By Request

Use fine steel hook, 3 spools ordinary crochet silk.

Ch. 22, turn 21 singles, then make 21 s. c. working through both loops each st.

3d row.—Ch. 3, 3 d. c. in 1st st., * skip 2 sts., 1 s. c. in next. Ch. 3, 3 d. c. in same st. Repeat from * making 7 shells in this row.

4th row.—Ch. 3, 2 d. c. in first s. c., 1 s. c. under ch., 2 d. c. in next s. c. and repeat.

Now repeat from beginning of 1st row until work is 15 inches long.

Narrow for neck band by decreasing 1 shell each end of a shell row, make 7 rows without decrease and again drop 2 shells, leaving work 3 shells wide and ready for band. For this crochet in pattern or all singles, make 10-inch strip, fasten off.

Begin 2nd end same as 1st, make 10 inches, decrease, then make six narrow rows, fasten off and join.

Knitted Motor Scarf

1 pr. No. 12 knitting needles, 2 spools silk.

Cast on 60 sts. Knit 20 rows plain. Now on each row 10 sts. on each end plain. 40 sts in center in dice pattern as follows:

P.4, k.4, next 3 rows purl the purled sts. Knit the knitted sts. Then 2 rows k. plain.

7th row.—P. 4, k. 4, then 3 rows purling and knitting same sts. 2 rows plain. This completes 2 series of blocks. Repeat from first block pattern, making scarf 30 inches long, then 20 rows plain knitting, bind off.

Work single crochet along all edges and tie 6-inch fringe in every 4th st. along each end.

Round Cushion

Although there is nothing new about this cushion in shape, it deserves mention as circular cushions are always popular and this is finished in a little out of the ordinary way. Instead of being rounded in all directions, the bottom is made flat, by using a piece of pasteboard. The top of the cushion is dome shaped the center of of this being covered plain and the edge finished with a puff.

ROUND TOP CUSHION.

This is a good idea for working up odd bits of one kind and another as two materials combined really make a prettier cushion.

One may vary the size to fit their goods, but for the center of a bureau a cushion five or six inches in diameter will be ample.

Woven Sofa Pillow Cover

A handsome and novel pillow cover may be made in the same way as the hot plate mats recently illustrated. For this nothing will be necessary but a square frame, a little larger than one wishes the finished cover.

For materials use soft three-inch ribbon and baby ribbon or silkateen for cross tying. Light blue ribbon tied with black and then mounted over canary yellow is only one of the many pretty combinations, others of which will readily suggest themselves, but one should plan for a good contrast of color to have the finished work most effective.

Cross the wide ribbons both ways of the frame, tacking securely on all sides, then tie crosswise with the baby ribbon or silk; this draws the wide ribbon apart into open squares which are crossed with the narrow ribbon.

Star Pin Cushion

This little novelty will require five five-inch squares of silk, fold each crosswise, or in shape of a triangle and seam up to two sides. After the five cushions are complete place together as shown in our illustration and fasten the top and bottom corners then finish the top with a bow of ribbon. Fill the cushion with wool. This prevents pins from rusting.

STAR PINCUSHION.

A Dainty Apron

This rather frivolous little affair is of Dresden silk and lace, but a pretty flowered lawn could be substituted without detracting much from its attractiveness.

In size the apron measures 18 inches in length

APRON OF SILK AND LACE.

by 14 inches in width without the lace edge. Two yards each of insertion and edging will be needed a yard and a half of ribbon for strings and three yards of baby ribbon for rosettes on either side at the top of the apron.

Crocheted Edging for Pillow Ends

Use course ecru cotton or carpet warp. Make ch. of ample length, turn, 1 tr. c. in third st., 1 tr. c. each every other st., ch. 3.

2nd row.—1 tr. c. in first tr. c., ch. 6, sk. 6 tr. c., 1 tr. c. in next, ch. 6, sk. 6, 1 tr. c., repeat, ch. 3.

3rd row.—1 tr. in each st. of ch. 6, ch. 3, sk. tr. in last row, 6 tr. on ch. 6, repeat.

4th row.—Ch. 3, 3 tr. c. under ch. 3, ch. 3, 3 tr. c. under same ch., ch. 3, 1 s. c. under next ch. 3. Repeat.

5th row.—4 s. c., ch. 3, 1 sl. st. to form picot, * 3 s. c., on 3 tr. c., 1 p., 2 s. c. under ch. 3, 1 p., 2 s. c. under same ch.

THE BRAND OF SHAME

By Maud Mary Brown

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

The Crisis in Two Lives

He caught her roughly, his anger past control. "My money bought you, didn't it? If one of my horses played the devil with me as you have done, I'd kill him. But I am not going to kill you. I am going to master you. My cattle bear my brand to warn thieves away, and before God, so shall you."

She sobbed and struggled but he was inexorable. "You may flaunt your white shoulders before men but they shall see that you have an owner—that YOU BELONG TO DRAKE, of the Big Four Ranch."

He held her, half-fainting, till he had accomplished his task, then, releasing her, he strode to the door and went down the street, while Julia, a sorry figure in her barbaric splendor, her shoulders marred by the brand that would mark her for life, lay in a huddled heap on the floor.

The dramatic incident above described is the crisis of this strong story which faithfully portrays a phase of modern life that is undermining social morals and needs a drastic remedy.

HAD Drake been able to blot out the vision of the man looking with too-admiring eyes into his wife's face, the living picture of Julia arranging nasturtiums in a huge brass bowl would have delighted him.

Warned by some telepathic message, the other man glanced at his host whose huge bulk half filled the doorway; he straightened instantly from his lounging position against the table.

"Morning, Drake," he greeted, and strolled nonchalantly out of the room.

"Well, Julia, aren't you up pretty early for you?" Drake advanced to his wife and waited for her to lift her face for his salute.

But Julia Drake kept her dark, rather sullen, eyes lowered. Except for the vivid scarlet of her lips there was no trace of color in her delicately-chiselled face.

"I couldn't bear to miss one moment of the last day they are to be here," she replied.

Drake frowned slightly. "You'll miss them, naturally. I shall miss that sister of yours, myself."

"And I shall miss Page," she said sharply. "And Kingsley Pierce as well. Jeff, just why are you not keeping King here at the ranch? You've often told me that you needed an assistant."

"My dear girl, Pierce has been down here for five months and he has no more command of the business than he had the day he came. Perhaps it isn't strange; you know very well the life he has led; this must seem pretty slow to him. When he came down with the idea of pulling up, I was glad enough to give him a trial; well, he hasn't made good. And I have no use for him. He hates it, to begin with——"

"You can't blame him for that," Julia interposed swiftly. She looked about the room, aversion in her eyes. Yet it was, as living-rooms in Texas go, a luxurious and very dignified apartment. It was, however, essentially a man's room; as yet, in spite of her having lived in it for a year, it reflected none of Julia Drake's personality. One would have said that it lacked the subtle touch that proclaimed its mistress a happy woman.

"Julia!" Drake's voice was sharp.

"Oh, I spoke hastily, Jefferson. But can't you see that being so very much alone nearly drives me mad? At times I become so ennuied that I could scream."

Drake's heavy brows met. "I can't understand it, dear," he said, "you can ride."

She laughed mirthlessly. "One can't ride all day, silly; and besides, this fierce sun hurts my eyes and ruins my skin. What it will be when summer really sets in, I dread to contemplate."

"There is the car, and you have books and magazines. You know you can order anything you want, honey."

She dismissed his generosity with a petulant gesture.

"Well, just what do you want, Julia?" he asked gravely.

"I want life!" Her dark eyes fired and her face quickened.

"And—Pierce means—life?"

"Jeff, stop! Kingsley Pierce is nothing to me except in so far as he represents the life that I gave up by marrying you. We both love New York and gayety but that is all." Her heavy lids curtained her eyes once more.

"Here they are!" Julia's younger sister had entered the room and was calling over her shoulder to Page Beardsley and Pierce. "They're at their mututinal philandering."

She glanced sharply at her sister and Drake, and wheeling suddenly, she surprised the frown on Pierce's brow.

"Will you see who's here!" young Beardsley sang out with his habitual grin. "Sister Julia! I don't seem to remember that she cared for worms!"

"Texas has reformed her, you audacious infant!" Edith Bentley returned. "She can get up with the best of us now. Isn't breakfast ready, sister? I am immoderately hungry."

Drake opened the door to the dining-room. He liked this frank, boyish sister of Julia's and he had hoped that her brief visit might help to restore his wife's contentment.

But, strangely enough, Julia had seemed almost indifferent to Edith and to Page Beardsley who had followed her South on the slender chance that a fresh environment might lead her to consider an engagement. Page was an amusing cub, too rich to make work a necessity, too indolent to desire it for the stimulant of accomplishment.

Edith Bentley and her exotic sister were dissimilar types, the younger being less inflammable, infinitely more wholesome. Without Julia's rare beauty, she nevertheless had her share; her color was fresher; her lips were fashioned on less petulant lines, and her eyes, while not so provocative, would, one felt certain, meet the world with a steadier gaze.

In spite of Page's nonsense, breakfast was not a cheerful feast. Pierce gloomed openly and Julia, her smoldering eyes downcast, was silent. Drake was serene enough, though he was unaccustomedly pale underneath his tan.

"What time do we light out in the morning?" queried Page Beardsley as they rose.

"By seven; I will drive you in myself. You will go, of course, Julia?"

"Oh, I suppose so. This triple exodus is cruel, if you're consulting me. Couldn't you manage to leave in sections?"

"Not I," returned Edith. "My chaperon has been cooling her heels in town long enough. She admits it. Page might stay."

Beardsley looked reproachfully into her tantalizing eyes. "Pierce," he said, turning to the older man, "I thought you came down here to learn ranching. Sick of it?"

"We will let it go at that," was Pierce's reply.

As they strolled out to the court between the two wings of the rambling bungalow, Drake adjusted his sombrero with care.

"The wagon will start with your baggage at daybreak," he said. "I must run along now. I rather expect we shall hit oil over on the eastern division today. And an engineer is coming—he'll be here for luncheon, Julia—to go with me into the hills to advise about that irrigation scheme. It's my busy day. Any one coming with me?"

The men were silent. Page Beardsley was too idle for such a morning and Pierce, now that his obligation had so nearly ceased, made no attempt to conceal his contempt for Drake.

"I'm going, Jeff, if I may," Edith declared.

"Good!" He looked at her with affection and she gave him back a smile.

"Silly!" jeered Julia. "They'll take you for a half-breed when you get back to New York. At least put on a broad hat."

After watching the two ride away, Page went to his room and Pierce turned eagerly to Mrs. Drake.

"This is probably our last hour alone, dear," he said; "can't we go where we shall be undisturbed?"

"The library is the most comfortable room in the morning," Julia returned coolly.

"Now then, what are we going to do about it?" he demanded when they had entered the room.

She chose not to understand.

"Don't try the tricks of the eternal woman at a time like this," he urged. "You know very well what I mean. Are you going North with us tomorrow?"

She considered a moment. "No," she replied.

"Just what ties you here? Surely not that self-centered husband of yours. You are not so much to him as a growthy steer. It maddens me to see you shunted aside for ditches and oil and live stock. I am not asking you to go away with me, dear. I am only urging you to go home to your father; then, when things adjust themselves, we can think about our own happiness. You've helped me to pull up, Julia; it can't be that you intend to desert me now. What are you going to do with me?"

She did not reply.

"Are you going to send me to the devil without a sign that you care?" He drew her to him.

"We mustn't, King."

"You do care?"

She pushed him away. "I don't know. I don't whether it is you or the life that you represent that I love. If I were sure——"

He reached for her again but she eluded his arms.

"I don't know what I am going to do after you leave." She covered her face with her white hands.

"Julia! I can't leave you here! It is too much to ask. Your youth and beauty will be devoured, crushed out. It is sacrilege. Dear, come with us tomorrow."

She caught her lips between her white teeth. "I shall never go back to my father's house without my husband," she said.

They heard Beardsley's footsteps approaching and Pierce, without another word, turned and strode out of the room.

Two people at dinner at the Big Four Ranch that night had no suspicion of the strain in the atmosphere. They were Drake and the young engineer whom he had persuaded to stay the night. Drake was unwontedly talkative. His drills had found oil and he anticipated a big yield.

Too, his irrigation scheme might be expected to work out satisfactorily. The two men discussed the matter, frequently interrupted by Edith who demanded explanation of their terms of speech.

The engineer obviously felt her charm and Beardsley, observing it, was disheartened. He tried to rouse himself, felt his technical inferiority, felt that the exertion was too great, and relapsed into sulky silence.

All save Drake and the engineer were in evening dress. Drake rarely got into his dinner clothes, Julia always.

She glanced at the two men so unembarrassed in their khaki, and her seductive lips curled.

She was radiant in a yellow frock with somewhere a daring touch of scarlet to add to its allurement. More than once the stranger glanced speculatively at her, wondering where Drake found his orchid and if it would survive transplanting.

After dinner the two men continued to dominate the conversation and Julia and her sister went early to their rooms, the latter to pack.

Getting into a peignoir, Julia drifted into Edith's room and perched on the bed to watch proceedings.

"Fancy having no maid! A civilized one won't stay a week."

"There are compensations, my dear."

"Are there! I wish you would lend me your glasses."

Edith sat back on the floor, encircling her knees with her bared arms. "Julia," she said, "if you aren't wary you're coming to a fearful cropper."

Mrs. Drake looked at her sister defiantly.

"You know quite well what I mean. You don't appreciate your husband. He is doing a tremendous work here. Doesn't the thought of it all—the cattle, the land, the oil, the ditches—thrill you? Can't you see the romance in it all?"

"Romance in steers! Look at me, Edith! Do you think I was fashioned for this sort of thing?"

"Foolish! You knew what you were doing. Jeff didn't drag you here an unwilling bride."

"No, but he dominated me during those few weeks in New York. He can do that. He took advantage of my youth and my ignorance of conditions here. Sometimes I think I shall go mad."

"You are a foolish and very self-centered woman, my dear. You could if you would, find tranquility here—find the eternal significance of things, which is life. You are too busy with your sandpile to appreciate the mountain."

Julia understood and reddened.

"I pity Jeff. A man has a right to expect his wife to be a woman, not a spoiled child; to play the game staunchly and without cheating." She resumed her packing in silence.

The next morning Julia, with hard, tearless eyes watched the train bearing away the reminders of her happier days.

"Come, dear," Drake urged after the train had rounded a curve, "it is time I was getting back to the ranch. There will be a couple of men in for luncheon."

"Always it is the ranch," sighed Julia.

"That's my job, girl."

She was silent during the rapid drive home but her thoughts were not idle. Julia was not stupid and she felt that her situation was desperate enough to legitimatize any measure for its alleviation.

During the first few months of her marriage Drake had satisfied her wholly. In his admiration for her there had been something very close to reverence; but the expression of his adoration had gradually ceased. It was not that he loved her less and she knew it; it was the final readjustment of marriage—the putting her out of his arms that they might be free for his work.

Before her dissatisfaction at this state of affairs had had time to crystallize, Kingsley Pierce, a distant kinsman and a New York man about town, had come to the Big Four. He fed her vanity unweariedly. It was the only thing which he did really well while at the ranch.

And now that he was gone, life stretched ahead, as monotonous as a vast plain. She wondered what she should do—how live. By tears and mutiny she knew that she could accomplish nothing with her husband. But there were other methods of achieving one's will with a man. And so she was thoughtful.

At luncheon she was charming to the strangers whom Drake brought home. Half expecting a sulky silence, he was delighted. At dinner her mood had not altered.

"Gad!" Drake ejaculated. "It is good to be alone with you again."

"But you have been following stimulating pursuits all day," she reminded him, smiling.

"And you have been lonely? There isn't much for you to do, is there? I always did say that supplanting the distaff and the wheel was bad business for the women."

"What primordial sentiments! Can you give me the evening?"

For a fraction of a moment Drake hesitated. "I have a bunch of letters to get off, but I'll see Jenkins for a few minutes and let him manage them. That man's a whale for work, honey."

During the days which followed Julia was with her husband as much has his pursuits permitted and she lost no opportunity to play upon the weakest spot in man's armor—love of power.

"Is it quite fair to bury your business talents down here?" she asked one day.

"Honey, I don't believe I get you."

"There is bigger, finer work for you up North. Oh, I understood your conversation with those men the other day. There is oil stock to be floated and there is that mining business to be put through."

In spite of her proximity and her soft appeal Drake saw clearly.

"Just my love isn't enough for you, is it, Julia?"

"Oh, my dear, yes! But let us not risk murdering it in a tete-a-tete on a Texas ranch."

"I abominate the city, dear; this is my life. Why, looking from any window in this house, so far as I can see, the land is mine! In the city I should be a cipher. It would be a poor exchange."

She laughed musically. "It is because I see how easily you could dominate them that I wish to see you there. Ah! I should be proud of you! And pride in her husband is a wife's sweetest vanity. A little man can do the work here—a machine, like Jenkins. Your place is on the fighting-line. Have you the courage to get to the front, dearest?"

He turned away from the soft, fleeting pressure of her hands.

That night she won his surrender. She called him to her where she lay on a chaise longue in her room. The moon wrapped her in a sweet and gentle radiance. She was intoxicatingly lovely.

She made room for him to sit beside her. "Dear," she began; "all day I have been thinking about you in New York. I know many of the big men up there and not one can surpass you. This life has been a training-school for bigger things. You can easily be one of the few big men in the country. Are you strong enough to break the fetters? Dear, are you?"

She raised her bared arms and drew him within reach of her scarlet lips and Drake gave his promise.

After a little he went out into the night. His senses had steadied; face in hands, he sat for hours, thinking. He felt humiliated. He had yielded against his better judgment—had yielded to the eternal Delilah. But he had yielded and he would go.

Toward morning he went to his room. His impulse was not to see Julia again that night, but, ready for bed, he stole softly into her room and left a kiss on her up-turned cheek.

When he had gone Julia's eyes flew wide. She had been very uneasy while he was out there under the stars. More than once she had crept to the window to watch him. But the crisis was passed; his kiss proved that. Stretching her pampered body luxuriously, she composed herself for sleep.

It was December and unseasonably warm in New York. Young Beardsley and Edith Bentley had been strolling through the park and they dropped idly on a bench to rest.

"Are you going to marry me, Edith?" Beardsley asked abruptly.

"I don't believe so, Page."

"Just why?" he demanded sullenly.

"Chiefly because your life is so like that of the squirrels yonder. It is measured by food and frolics. I couldn't marry a man like that."

"But good Lord, Edith! Why should I do any silly work? There's more money now than the two of us can ever spend."

"Oh, money!" She gave him one of her direct looks. "Does it never occur to you that it would be splendid to do something big—to force something true out of life?"

Page kicked petulantly at a pebble. "I don't begin to understand you," he growled. "But I know what is the matter with you; you're dippy about that big brother-in-law of yours. I wish he had stayed in Texas."

"So do I," was Edith's prompt retort.

"Your jolly sister, doesn't, you'd better believe."

"Julia is a little fool! She is throwing away her bread and butter to nibble at an eclair. Page, I couldn't speak of this to any one else, not even to father, but I'm worried about Julia."

"Nonsense, girl! Julia's doing what all the pretty matrons do—nothing more."

"It is quite enough. The only thing that conceivably can interest her in Kingsley Pierce is the fact that he is not her husband."

"That doesn't sound pretty."

"It isn't pretty. I wish Jeff would take her by one of her white shoulders and march her back to Texas. I think I shall tell him so."

"But this isn't getting me anywhere. Are you going to marry me?"

"I am going to marry a man, Page, or remain a spinster."

There was a pregnant silence between them. Then, "If I became a man, dear?"

They both rose and she stretched out her hands impulsively. "It would make me the happiest girl in New York," she said.

In silence they went out of the park and to her door. "I am not coming in, dear. I shall see you at the Lawrences' ball of course. Good by till then." And Edith watched him as he hurried down the street.

Jefferson Drake and his wife had come to New York early in October. It had been an unusually lovely autumn and after the heat of the South, the tonic air and the hills decked like an Italian peasant on a fete day, delighted Drake.

Julia, frenziedly happy, spent long hours in the shops, buying everything that her starved impulses demanded.

A stock company was formed to conduct the oil operations and engineers were despatched to investigate the mineral deposits in the region west of the Pecos. Drake was the leader in these movements. He made many and advantageous acquaintances and before many weeks had passed he was pledged to two exclusive clubs.

In all these things Julia took an interest merely because they served to keep her husband occupied and contented. Of the appearance he would make when the social season really opened, she considered ruefully. Some of Drake's personality was lost when he donned evening clothes.

Not for long, however, did she worry over his potential social incompetence. Kingsley Pierce would see her through. He assured her of that frequently.

At first the Drakes had been with Mr. Bentley and Edith, but before the visit had lasted many days the situation became strained through Mr. Bentley's disapproval of Pierce's constant attendance upon Julia.

"He is a bad lot, my dear. He has damned more than one married woman right here under our eyes."

"Father! What a cordial way to speak of a kinsman."

"The relationship, thank heaven, is not close enough to worry over. See that you do not let him trade upon it. And you must see less of him while you are a guest of my house; otherwise, I shall advise Jefferson to take you back to Texas."

Julia was furious and she immediately persuaded Drake to lease an apartment on the Drive.

The first brilliant social event of the season was a fancy dress ball and being given for the war sufferers, it would be particularly sumptuous. Julia, at Pierce's suggestion, was to go as Cleopatra. She told Drake about it prettily and begged his pecuniary indulgence.

Happy at having been given a free rein, she observed him gravely. "You are too big for Napoleon, Jeff. But wasn't there some strapping destiny-maker whom you could impersonate?"

He smiled indulgently. "I don't expect to be able to go," he replied. "Jenkins plans to be here that night and we have many things to go over. I am afraid you will have to go with Edith, honey."

"Oh, I shall manage," Julia replied.

On the night of the ball, Drake could not get up home for dinner for Jenkins was taking a late-evening train South and every moment was valuable.

At nine o'clock, however, Drake called a taxicab and ran up home for the pleasure of seeing Julia in her splendor. He let himself in quietly and hearing voices in the drawing-room, went directly there.

Kingsley Pierce was the first upon whom his eyes fell. Drake nodded perfunctorily and turned to his wife. She stood motionless, her breath uneven, as he looked her up and down, and defiance smoldered in her eyes and perched on her scarlet lips.

"Gorgeous, isn't she?" Pierce shattered the silence to ask.

Drake half turned to him. "If you will excuse us, Pierce, I have something that I wish to say to my wife."

"You can have nothing to say that Kingsley may not hear," Julia fired.

Drake turned back to her. "You know you're not going out like that," he said gravely.

"Oh, am I not?" Julia was very angry. "Don't be more provincial than you can help, Jeff. This is nothing to some of the costumes."

He looked at her once more, from her jewel-decked head down to her bared, white bosom, unrelieved by any ornament. He glanced at her bare arms aflame with jewels, her rich, barbaric costume, her bared feet with their anklets and tiny sandals. His silent scrutiny strained her nerves. She rather regretted now having allowed her imagination to run riot after hearing that her husband would neither go to the fete nor be home to dinner. She had not planned this for his eyes.

At last he withdrew his eyes and coolly lit a cigarette. "My wife is not going into public like that," he said. Then his customary control broke bounds. "Good God! Have you no delicacy? Would you let men gaze at you as you are now? Get into that room!" He pointed to the door of Julia's chamber with a steady hand though his anger was rising like a strong wind. "And stay there!" he added. "You are not going out tonight."

He waited, alert, while Julia drew up her lissome body in a brave attempt at defiance; but under his steady gaze her will broke and she went slowly into her room.

The Masked Bridal

"Jist forninst her, sir—on the same floor, across the hall."

"She writes that her mother is very ill."

"Whisht, sir; the poor lady's dyin', sir," said Kate.

"Dying!" exclaimed Royal Bryant, aghast.

"Yes, sir; she has consumption; and just afther the officer—bad luck to 'im!—took the young lady away, she had a bad coughin' spell, and burst a blood-vessel, and she has been failin' ever since," the woman explained.

"Who is with Mrs. Allandale now?" questioned Mr. Bryant, with a look of deep anxiety.

"The docthor, sir; he promised to stay wid her till I come back."

"Well, then, Mrs. O'Brien, if you will be good enough to hurry back and care for Mrs. Allandale, I will go at once to her daughter; and I am very sure that I can secure her release within a short time. Tell her mother so, and that I will send her home immediately upon her release."

"Bless yer kind heart!" cried the woman, heartily, and she hurried away to take the blessed news to Edith's fast-failing mother.

The moment the door closed after her, Royal Bryant seized his overcoat and began to put it on again, his face aflame with mingled indignation and mortification.

He was just fastening the last button of his coat when there came a knock upon his door.

"Come in," he said, but frowning with impatience at the unwelcome interruption and the probable detention which it portended.

An instant later a rather common-looking man, of perhaps forty years, entered the room.

"Ah, Mr. Knowles! good-morning, good-morning," said young Bryant, with his habitual cordiality. "What can I do for you today?"

"I—I have called to pay an installment upon what I owe you, Mr. Bryant," the man responded.

"Ah, yes; I had forgotten that this was the date for the payment. I hope, however, that you are not inconveniencing yourself in making it today."

"There is nothing that inconveniences me more than debt," the man evasively replied, but quickly repressing a sigh, as he drew forth a well-worn purse, while his companion saw that his lips trembled slightly as he said it.

Opening the purse, Mr. Knowles produced a small coin and extended it to the lawyer.

It was a five-dollar gold-piece.

Almost unconsciously, Mr. Bryant turned the money over, his glance still riveted upon it.

As he did so he gave a violent start which caused his companion to regard him curiously.

"Great Scott!" he exclaimed, in vehement excitement, as he bent to examine the coin more closely, "this is the strangest thing that ever happened to me in all my experience!"

CHAPTER IV.

A MYSTERY EXPLAINED.

"Is there anything wrong about the money?" Mr. Knowles inquired, a gleam of anxiety in his eyes.

"Pardon me," said Royal Bryant, flushing, as he was thus recalled to himself; "you are justified in asking the question, and I trust you will not regard me as impertinently inquisitive if I inquire if you can remember from whom you received this piece of money."

"Certainly I remember," Mr. Knowles replied.

"Will you kindly tell me the name of the person from whom you took it?"

Mr. Knowles appeared embarrassed and hesitated about replying.

"I have a special and personal reason for asking you," Mr. Bryant continued. "See!" he added, holding the gold-piece before him where the light struck full upon it, "you perceive this coin is marked," and he pointed out some vertical scratches which had been made just inside the margin. "I made those marks myself."

"Can that be possible!" exclaimed his companion.

"Yes. This very piece of money was in my possession as late as five o'clock last Saturday afternoon."

"I cannot understand," said Mr. Knowles.

"Let me explain," returned Mr. Bryant. "I owed my copyist exactly five dollars, and, having nothing smaller in bills than tens, I was obliged to pay her with this coin. While she was getting ready to leave the office, I sat toying with it and scratched it, as you see, with the point of my penknife; then I gave it to Miss Allandale, and thought no more about the matter. But just before you came in this morning, I received a note from her saying she had been arrested for passing the coin with which I had paid her, it having been declared counterfeit, and she begged me to come at once to her assistance and try to prove her innocence. I was just on the point of doing so when you called."

"What a very singular circumstance," Mr. Knowles remarked, reflectively. "It appears all the more so to me from the fact that I also received this piece of money no later than seven o'clock on last Saturday evening."

"You amaze me!" exclaimed Mr. Bryant. "Pray explain to me how you came by it—it may help to solve this very perplexing mystery, for I am confident that the coin is genuine, in spite of the trouble it has brought upon Miss Allandale."

"Yes, I will be frank with you," his companion returned, but flushing again, "and tell you that, in order to make this payment to you, I was obliged to borrow the money and gave, as security, a valuable mantel clock, which was one of my wife's wedding gifts. In other words, I pawned it. It goes against my pride to confess it; but the idea of debt is horrible to me; and, having been in very straitened circumstances of late, from sickness in my family and other causes, I had no other means of meeting my obligations to you, while I hoped to be able to redeem the clock before the time allotted should expire."

"Mr. Knowles, I thank you heartily for telling me this, while, at the same time, I am deeply pained," gravely returned Royal Bryant. "I would not have had you so pressed for a great deal; my claim against you can wait indefinitely, and you need feel no anxiety regarding it. Take your own time about it, for I am sure that I can safely trust a man to whom the idea of debt is so repulsive."

"You are very good," said Mr. Knowles, in a grateful tone.

"I shall return you this amount," the young lawyer resumed, "but in bills, for I wish to retain this gold-piece; and I beg that you will go at once and redeem your wife's clock. I am also going to throw a little business in your way, for I would like to retain you as a witness for Miss Allandale, and you shall be well paid for your services. Now please give me the name of the pawnbroker from whom you took the money."

"Solon Retz, No. —— Third avenue."

"Ah, yes; I know him for a scheming and not over-scrupulous person. I fought a tough battle with him a year or so ago."

But Royal Bryant still looked greatly perplexed.

He could not understand how the pawnbroker could have had that particular gold-piece to loan upon Mr. Knowles' clock, before seven o'clock on Saturday evening, when Edith Allandale had been arrested, that same night, for trying to pass it off upon the grocer of whom she had spoken in her note.

To him it seemed an inexplicable mystery.

However, he knew—he could take his oath—that the coin which he now held in his hand was the identical piece of money which he had paid to his beautiful but unfortunate copyist for her last week's work, and he was also reasonably sure that it was not a counterfeit.

"I suppose you will have no objection to testifying as to how and from whom you received the money?" he inquired of Mr. Knowles, after a few moments' reflection.

"Certainly not, if such testimony will be of any benefit to the young lady's cause," he readily replied. "And," he added, "I can easily prove the truth of my assertions, as I have here the ticket which I received from the pawnbroker."

"Ah! that is well thought of, and will undoubtedly score a strong point for Miss Allandale," Mr. Bryant exclaimed, with animation. "And now allow me to advance you the fee for your services as a witness," he added, as he pressed a ten-dollar note into his companion's hand. "This will be sufficient to redeem your clock and remunerate you for the time you may lose in appearing as a witness. Hereafter, Mr. Knowles, if you find yourself short of cash, pray do not be troubled about what is owing me—do not try to pay it until it is perfectly convenient for you to do so."

"You are very considerate, Mr. Bryant," the man returned, with evident emotion. "I cannot tell you how your generosity touches me, for the world has gone very badly with me of late."

"Well, we will hope for better times in the future for you, sir," was the cheery response of the noble-hearted young lawyer. "Now I must be off," he added, "and I would like you to meet me at the Thirtieth street station-house in an hour from now. I shall know by that time what I shall be able to do for my young friend."

He bade the man good-morning and bowed him out of his office, and, five minutes later, was on his way to the assistance of beautiful Edith Allandale.

Before boarding a car, he stepped into a bank near-by and had the gold coin tested.

It proved to be just as he had thought—it was perfectly good, and if Edith had been arrested for passing it, some one would have to stand damages for having subjected her to such an injustice.

Upon his arrival at the station-house, and requesting an interview with Miss Allandale as her attorney, the police sergeant conducted him directly to the room occupied by Edith, who looked so pale and wan from anxiety and confinement that the young man's conscience smote him keenly, although his heart bounded with sudden joy when he saw how her sad face lighted at the sight of him.

"This is the most outrageous thing I ever heard of, Miss Allandale," he exclaimed, as he clasped her cold hand.

"I was sure you would come," she murmured, with a sigh of relief, but flushing for an instant beneath his ardent gaze, while her lips quivered with suppressed emotion, for his tone of sympathy had almost unnerved her.

"Of course I would come—I would go to the ends of the earth to serve you," he began, eagerly. "I am filled with remorse when I think what you must have suffered and that I am responsible for your trouble, though unintentionally and unconsciously."

"Yes, I am sure you could not have known that the money was counterfeit," said Edith, wearily.

"And it was not," he quickly returned. "It is a genuine coin and negotiable anywhere."

"But I was told by two different persons that it was spurious," Edith replied, in a tone of surprise.

"Then you were misinformed in both cases, for I have had it tested at a bank, and it has been pronounced good."

"You have had it tested? How can that be possible, when the grocer who caused me to be arrested has the money in his possession this moment?" the young girl exclaimed, in amazement.

Royal Bryant smiled as he drew forth the half-eagle which he had received from Mr. Knowles, and laid it in her palm.

"That is the five-dollar gold-piece that I gave you on Saturday evening," he remarked, in a quiet tone.

"Have you seen the grocer? Did you get it from him?" Edith gasped.

"No; an old client of mine brought it to me, about half an hour ago, in part payment of a debt which he owes me."

"I do not understand—it cannot be the same," said Edith, with a look of perplexity.

"But it is," was the smiling reply. "Look at it closely, and you will find some fresh scratches upon one side of it—do you see?"

"Yes," the young girl admitted.

"Very well; I made them with my penknife during a fit of absent-mindedness, while you were putting on your hat and shawl on Saturday evening," Royal Bryant explained. "It was all the money I had, excepting some large bills, and I was obliged to give it to you, even though I knew it was not a convenient form—one is so liable to lose such a small piece. I am sure I do not know what possessed me to deface it in the way I did," he continued, after a slight pause; "but there the marks are, fortunately, and I could swear to the coin among a hundred others of the same denomination."

"Yes, I remember, now," Edith remarked, reflectively; "I noticed the gold-piece in your hands and that you were using your knife upon it; but how could it have come into the possession of your client? Surely the grocer would not have parted with it voluntarily, for it was all the proof he had against me."

"No; my client, Mr. Knowles, obtained it from a pawnbroker at No. ——Third avenue," Mr. Bryant replied.

Instantly the red blood mounted to the girl's fair brow, and, like a flash, Royal Bryant comprehended how all her trouble had come about.

"Yes," she sighed, after a moment, as if in reply to some question from him, "the week before I went into your office I was obliged to borrow some money upon a beautiful watch of mamma's. It was a very valuable one, but the man would only advance me three dollars upon it. Of course I felt that I must redeem it with the very first money I earned, and I went immediately to the pawnbroker's to get it on leaving your office. He seemed averse to the early redemption of the watch, and threw my money impatiently into the drawer. The next instant he gave it back to me, angrily telling me that it was counterfeit, and charging me with trying to cheat him. But, even now, I cannot understand ——"

"So the pawnbroker threw your money into his drawer, did he?" interposed Mr. Bryant, eagerly grasping at this important point.

"Yes; but, as I said, he returned it immediately to me, and I was obliged to go home without my watch. I was in great distress because, Mr. Bryant, it was all the money I had, and there were things that mamma and I must have in order to be comfortable over Sunday," Edith confessed, with crimson cheeks and downcast eyes, the sight of which made her companion's heart ache for her. "Mamma suggested that the money might not be bad, after all," she continued, determined that he should know the whole truth about the matter; "that, possibly, the pawnbroker had taken that way to retain the watch, with the hope of ultimately securing it; so I started out to make my purchases. The grocer made no objection to the money and gave me my change without a word. But half an hour later he appeared with an officer and had me arrested. He would not have pressed the matter if I could have returned his money; but, as I could not, and he claimed he had suffered from so many similar cases of swindling, he was obdurate, and I was obliged to come here."

"It was shameful!" said the young lawyer, indignantly. "It was a heartless thing to do. But, my little friend, I think we have a very clear case, and you will soon be fully vindicated."

"Oh! do you? I shall be very grateful——" Edith began, then stopped, choking back a sob that had almost burst from her trembling lips.

"I see you do not quite comprehend how that can be," continued her friend, ignoring her emotion. "But the piece of money which the pawnbroker pretended to return to you was not the same that you had received from me—it was a spurious one which he had at hand for the express purpose evidently of tricking the unwary, and Mr. Solon Retz, will ere long, be compelled to exchange places with you, if I can possibly bring him to justice."

Has your Rubber Footwear a Pedigree?

These are famous trade-marks in the rubber footwear industry. Each one of these marks stands for the product of a great factory—great in reputation as well as size. If your rubber footwear bears one of these brands, it is the descendant of a long line of quality products; it has a worthy "pedigree."

It would require an expert to determine, from appearance alone, the difference in quality between good and poor rubber footwear. The principal guide would be the better shaping—snappier style. And style in rubber footwear—off the foot—might baffle even keen eyes.

Only well-made, high-grade rubber footwear will look well, fit well and wear well. Only by securing a standardized, trade-marked, pedigreed quality product such as these brands represent can you distinguish the best from the rest and be sure of wear, fit, style and quality.

Seventy-four years of successful manufacturing and the experience of forty-seven great factories are back of every pair of rubber shoes, overshoes, arctics, boots, etc., produced by the United States Rubber Company, the largest rubber manufacturer in the world.

Rubbers that fit wear twice as long as rubbers that do not fit.

PALINDROMES

THE palindrome, which is defined as being a word, verse, or sentence which is the same when read either backward or forward, while common in Latin is unusual in the English language. A notable example represents our first parent politely introducing himself to Eve in the Garden of Eden in these words:

"Madam, I'm Adam."

Another worthy example is found in the reply made by Napoleon in exile, upon being asked if he thought he would have been able to invade the British Isles:

"Able was I ere I saw Elba."

An adaption of the French general's famous response is:

"Live was I ere I saw evil."

An imperfect example, owning to the misspelling of one word and the employment of the "&", is here given:

"Lewd did I live & evil I did dwel."

A few of the common palindromic words are civic, tenet, noon, madam, and Hannah.

WORLD'S CROPS.—The latest report of the International Institute of Agriculture indicates that the world's crops this year will be less abundant than last, but that harvest prospects are better than the average in the five-year period, 1909-1913. The estimate of the total wheat crop this year for the seven most important countries is 396,510,000 quintals (a quintal equals 220.46 pounds), or 76,734,000 quintals less than last year. For the United States the wheat total is estimated at 207,000,000 quintals or 25 per cent less than last year. Barley prospects are everywhere poorer than last year, the institute estimates, as are also those for oats and rye. The estimate of the Brazilian coffee crop is slightly under last year.

Pocket Flashlight

Premium No. 708

Given For A Club Of Three

THERE are so many occasions when a flashlight is a necessity it would be impossible to name them all but there is one thing sure—it is the handiest and safest means of illuminating ever devised. We offer here one of the best pocket flashlights made. It is known as the "Eveready," which is certainly an appropriate name as it is always ready when you want to use it. But the greatest feature of this flashlight is its safety around inflammable material. In the house it lights up the darkest rooms or clothes closets, dark corners in the basement, in the garret; it may be used around gasoline, or powder, in the stable, in the barn, even in the hay mow, and there is not the slightest danger of fire. It throws a shaft of steady brilliance right in the teeth of wind or rain. The mere pressure of your finger starts and stops the light at your will and it is so small and compact that you can carry it around in your vest pocket where it does not take up any more room than a cigarette box. The "Eveready" is beautifully finished in polished nickel with a hinged bottom which opens to replace the battery and is equipped with a push button as well as a sliding switch for a flash or continuous light. It is equipped with a Tungsten battery and bulb and gives a surprisingly powerful bright light and the battery with average use will last from two to four months. When one battery becomes exhausted you can easily buy another one anywhere as they are on sale in every city and town in the United States. Or, if you prefer, we will furnish you with additional batteries free of cost in return for a few subscriptions to COMFORT. We will send you this flashlight with battery and bulb complete, ready for business as soon as you receive it, upon the terms of the following

CLUB OFFER. For a club of only three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you one "Eveready" flashlight as described above free by Parcel Post prepaid. (Premium No. 708.) We can also supply you with extra batteries for the "Eveready" at the rate of one battery free for a club of two one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each. (Premium No. 709.)

V. P., California.—We are of the opinion, that upon the proper commitment order, procured in the proper manner, an insane person can be committed to a state institution for the insane from any part of your state; we think your state makes provisions for free treatment of insane persons without property or relatives able to provide for them.

Mrs. M. G., California.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a woman arrives at her majority at eighteen years, but if she marries before she arrives at that age, the authority of a guardian of her person ceases, but not that of the guardian of her estate.

R. A. O., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the purchaser, named in a contract of sale of property, can legally dispose of his right under such contract without the consent of the other party to the contract, unless there is some limitation in the contract providing otherwise.

Mrs. E. C. S., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the signature of both the husband and wife are necessary to the conveyance of homestead property belonging to either; we think the father can be compelled to support his children of tender years.

Mrs. L. W., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that a married woman cannot by will bar her husband from dower of a one third interest for life in her real estate, and an absolute right to one third of her personal property in case he survives her. We do not think there is any other limitation of her right to dispose of her property by will.

Mrs. W. G. F., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that where the deed to property runs to the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety, upon the death of one, the whole property goes to the survivor. We think you should proceed in court against the administration of the estate in Philadelphia who you state has not accounted for the property of the estate in which you have an interest in seven years.

R. M. L., Texas.—Under the laws of your state we do not think the wife has any interest in her husband's separate property unless she survives him, nor do we think the children have any interest in their father's separate property during his lifetime; but we think that upon the death of either the father or mother one half of the community or common property would go to the survivor and the other one half in equal shares to the children.

A. L. L., North Carolina.—We think that the marriage of an uncle and niece is within the prohibited degrees in all parts of the United States.

Mrs. L. J. P., North Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, his estate would all go to his widow, if one survives him, and provided the estate does not exceed in value five thousand dollars. The excess over five thousand dollars, if any, would go one half to the widow, and one half to the father, mother, brothers and sisters in the orders named, except that brothers and sisters have no priority over each other, and except that the descendants of a deceased brother or sister would take their parent's share.

Mrs. F. L. S., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a surviving widow and children his widow would receive one third of the estate absolutely, the balance going in equal shares to the children; of course, this would apply to only such property as the decedent owned in his own right absolutely.

Mrs. G. M., California.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property acquired after marriage, by either husband or wife, except such as may be acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent shall be common property and that upon the death of the husband, the wife succeeds to one half of such community property, after the payment of debts and expenses of administration, and the other half is subject to the husband's testamentary disposition and in the absence of that and of descendants, is distributed one half to the surviving wife and the other half to the parents, brothers and sisters or their descendants depending upon who is left.

Mrs. E. A. R., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the signature of the husband is necessary to the conveyance of good title to real estate belonging to the wife.

Mrs. L. O'B., Wyoming.—Under the laws of the United States, we are of the opinion that the children of persons who have been duly naturalized being under the age of twenty-one years at the time of the naturalization of their parents shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens thereof. We think you should apply to the Commissioner of Public Lands at Washington, D. C., or your nearest United States land office as to your application for homestead land.

C. G., Colorado.—We do not think that there is any complete list of the estates of descendants published in any country of the world.

E. L. M., Illinois.—We think you have little or no chance to recover any part of the property you mention if your claim has been allowed to lay dormant since 1874.

Mrs. C. G. J., Pennsylvania.—Of course as you must understand we can form no opinion from the few statments you make to us as to just what your chances are to enforce the agreement with your uncle, we think that in case you are unable to settle your dispute and it becomes necessary to take the matter in the courts the determination will depend upon which side produces the most conclusive evidence as to just what your agreement was.

Mrs. E. N. H., Texas.—We do not think the laws of the United States provides pensions for former confederate soldiers. We think you should be able to obtain the documents you mention through your nearest bookseller.

Mrs. M. McC., Washington.—We can give you no advice as to how to conceal your property in order to avoid the payment money ordered paid by some court judgment or decree; we think such payments should be made and not avoided.

Mrs. F. T. D., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a widow and children, his real estate would go one third to the widow and the balance in equal shares to his children, the issue of any deceased child taking the parent's share; we think the children of the surviving widow would receive the same share as children by a former wife, and we do not think the children of the former wife would receive any share in the property held by their mother and father as tenants by the entirety until both parents are dead as we think that upon the death of the mother the whole property went to the father, if he survived her. We think his present wife has no interest in his property during his lifetime except that she is entitled to support from him. We think that upon his death, without a will, his wife and children would receive the same share in his personal property as in the real estate except for some small extra provisions for the widow and small children.

Marketing Your Furs

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

FURS are very valuable. The trapper who realizes this and understands that their proper care means more dollars in his pocket, will do his best to skin, dry and handle his pelts so they show up well. Then, when the buyer gets them, the battle is half won.

The skins of animals that have been trapped, of course, bring a greater price than those that have been shot.

The first thing the trapper wants to remember is to try and get the pelt off as soon as he can, after the animal is dead. The quicker it is skinned, the easier it comes off.

To take off the pelt in proper manner, skinning should be commenced at the tail and the hide worked down over the body. Starting from the tail, make a cut down the inside of the hind leg to the feet. Keep pulling on the skin and with a real sharp skinning knife, help it along, wherever it hangs tight. Use great care when you reach the forward legs and about the eyes and ears, so as not to cut the skin and thereby damage it. Flesh the bone out of the tail as far as you can by slitting the skin in the center of the tail, and pulling out the bone.

There are some skins that may split down the belly and not decrease their value. These are the wild-cat, raccoon, southwestern prairie wolf, sometimes called coyote, beaver, bear and badger. After splitting the belly, remove the pelt by working carefully around the legs, eyes and ears and above all, do not cut the skin. Start at the head and work towards the tail.

While already manufactured stretchers can be bought, they are expensive and most trappers make their own. Get some boxes from any store, soft pine is the best to use and they are already planed and smooth. As mink are graded large, medium and small, boards for the large size should be about 30 inches long and three and one quarter inches wide; medium, 24 inches long and two and one half inches wide; small, 18 inches long and two and one half inches wide. These boards should have a slight taper to the head and at this end they should be rounded to about a half circle so as to fit the head of the mink. The mink boards will also do for marten and civet cat.

Muskrats and skunks require different size boards, longer and wider but tapered in a similar way. In fact, all boards should follow this outline and the size of the pelt will govern the exact size of the stretcher. Those pelts which have been split down the belly should be tacked to a shed or barn and allowed to dry.

When drawing the pelt on to the stretching board, be sure it is on smoothly and evenly. Stretch it tightly and fasten by tacking in the head and tail and in the feet. Always place the flesh side out and never rub any salt or alum on the pelt.

The drying is very important and to do it right means much in selling. After your skins have been placed on the boards, scrape off all the meat and fat you can, using a knife or draw shave or anything that will do the work without cutting the skin. Place the skins in a dry, shady spot to dry. In warm climates, they should be in a cool spot and out of the way of flies. Never dry a skin near the fire or in the sun. Do not wash the skins. Let them stay on the stretchers until well dried.

Now comes the packing of the furs. This is almost as important as the skinning and curing, for the finest furs can be spoiled as far as looks go, by improper packing. And always remember it is the looks that sell fur.

After the skins have been well dried, they should be packed in a bundle flat, one on top of the other or side by side sufficient to make a good bundle. Never roll or fold the skins.

The popular way to ship furs heretofore was by express. Since the parcel post was established, the trapper is enabled to forward furs to any place very cheaply. All he has to do is to wrap the fur securely, and hand it to the rural mail carrier who stops at his door. It is best to insure valuable furs, as sometimes packages are lost in the mails.

Any dry fur may be shipped by express or parcel post, in burlap, sack or bundle. Some express agents try to force a shipper to box dry furs but that is wrong and they should be reported to headquarters.

The skunk skin, when dry, need not be boxed. If fresh and emitting its usual odor, the express agent has a right to require the trapper to box the skunk skins. The postmaster will not accept any package containing green skunk skins that smell but if your skunk skin is dry and odorless, it can be mailed.

Be sure your bundles are tight. Do not tie the neck of a sack loosely and then when some of your skins are gone, blame the house buying them. Do not use any sack with holes in it.

The fur houses who solicit your business in COMFORT will send you quotations, invoice blanks and plenty of tags.

About Fowl

A few days prior to Thanksgiving, two aged Irishmen, who had not seen each other for a long time, chanced to meet in a butcher shop. They were both intent on buying fowl for the feast day, and one said to the other:

"Say, Mike, how do you tell the age of a chicken?"

"Sure that's aisy; by the teeth."

"By the teeth?"

"Yes."

"Go 'long with you, sure a chicken has no teeth."

"No, but I have."

Charades for Thanksgiving

By Geraldine Ames

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

IT is not necessary to select for all of your charades words that need three or four different scenes. They become tiresome, and short words, or words that need only one or two "scenes" or "acts" make the entertainment much better, as it brings on quicker changes and seems to make the whole entertainment livelier.

For an innovation, bring on several words at one time. The master or mistress of ceremonies may explain that each person or group represents a word. This keeps the spectators guessing in a lively manner. For example, take the simple words, "Uproar," "Understand," "Overcoat," "Intent," "Down-trod" and "By-laws." The entire six words may be put on at once. They add to the merry confusion and make it more difficult to guess. For convenience in guessing, each one of the six may be numbered from one to six, that the spectators may designate by saying "Number one is 'Uproar,'" etc.

Uproar

A child climbs up on a step-ladder and roars.

Understand

A child sits under a small table.

Intent

Child in a small tent.

Overcoat

Place a coat beneath a chair and have child sit on chair.

Downtrod

Child picks some "down" from bit of swansdown fur, then treads on it and stops, making it past tense, or downtrod.

By-laws

A stack of calf-bound law books on a stand and a child stands close beside them.

It is true these seem very simple. And if one at a time were performed they would be much easier to guess, but start the entire six at once and what between glancing from one to the other and laughing, the youngsters will have a rather difficult time of it.

Primrose

A clever little girl who can act very primly, with many mincing mannerisms, may enter carrying a rose. She sits middle of a couch and a boy enters and sits beside her. She moves over to other end. She acts very "prim" indeed.

Book-mark

Not so easy as it seems if you can get a very small child to enter, pick a book from the table (previously placed there for the child—a catalog or something without value) and sits on the floor. Child very busily engaged in marking up the pages, scrawling over them, with a pencil. A big blue crayon pencil would be best.

Blacksmith

Someone calls off stage (next room will do for this) "Is Mr. Smith out there?" And a voice replies, "Yas'm I'se here," then a boy blacked up and wearing a man's hat and long trousers, appears. That's all there is to it. But it is surprising to find how few can readily guess that this is "black" smith.

Maine

Child may sit on hobby horse and continually stroke his mane.

New Jersey

Child wears a bright jersey and tells another child it is new, not using the word "jersey" but merely saying, "This is new. Yes, this is brand new," etc.

Indiana

An immense letter D cut from cardboard or made of sticks. A little girl comes out with name "Anna" pinned on her, and stands inside the "D."

These three, like the group of six above, will prove more amusing if produced at the same time.

There are many words that one simple act will describe. They are not as easy when acted as they seem to be just by reading about them.

Three states may be used at once, first explaining that the next scene represents three different states.

Ice Cream

This is amusing. A child may start to drink some water from a glass, make up a face, leave room and come back with a large piece of ice which he drops in it.

The next part a girl comes on with a kitten, a saucer and cream jar, pours some cream and makes kitty drink it.

Tennis Raquet

A couple of children may stretch a little net and play tennis, gently of course, while two more children with a horn and tin pan may make a fearful racket. Everyone will guess "tennis" but be surprised when told that is not right, as the whole charade is "tennis raquet."

Music

Behind a screen have a child holding a cat. Child to "meaou" like a cat, a dozen times, then release cat and push him out from behind scene. The next part is a child on a couch with bandage about head. The whole, of course, is "mew" "sick."

Moving Pictures in Three Reels

Youngster may move three wall pictures, hung low purposely, or three framed pictures from mantel to piano. Child to reel about dizzily while moving each one.

Innocence

Child brings on a large card lettered like this: "Meet me Tuesday noon by moonlight between Thursday and the Fourth of July." The more they study it, the more will they become puzzled. "I don't see any sense to it!" some will exclaim. Tell them that's right and that they have nearly guessed it. The answer is, of course, that it is in no sense.

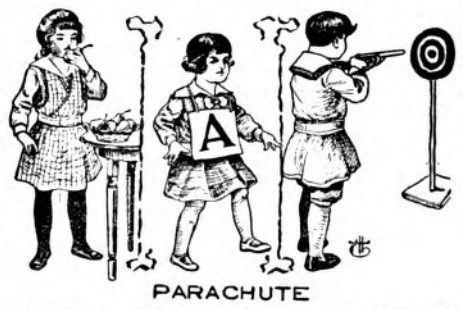
Cramophone

A tiny set of scales, like jewelers' scales, if possible, is used. Some one picks up a pin from the floor and says: "How much does a pin weigh?" Another weighs it and announces that it weighs one "grame." In the next scene a bill collector calls and demands payment, saying: "You owe this, why not pay it now," the child—a girl, may answer: "Wait and I will see if I can pay it?" then she pretends to telephone to the bank and ask if she has overdrawn her account, finds she has not, writes check and collector departs. "The grame," "owe" and "phone" makes the word. If they cannot guess it, start up a gramophone in an adjoining room as the "whole."

Airship

This should be puzzling if properly produced. First a child sits at piano and plays a simple tune, or sings a little song. That's the "air." Then the players nail up a wooden box, put on a label and the "expressman" in cap and overalls, comes and asks what's wanted. He is told that they want to "ship" that box to 'Frisco. If they fail to guess, the children may run to window, look up to sky, point and shout "O-o-o! See it! There it goes!" This should be sufficient for a hint that the whole is an airship.

Magic



Somewhat of a pun, but some of the best charades depend on the phonetic system. Someone calls "Madge! Oh, Madge! Are you there? Come here, dear," and a little girl runs on. "Oh, there you are, Madge." Next a bright youngster pretends to be afflicted with hiccoughs. He goes about trying to stop it, and continues to "hiccough" taking care to say only "ich! ich! ich!" For the whole, if it is not guessed, some child may perform a simple little trick in magic.

Santa Claus

This needs first a child playing the lady. She says: "Oh, where's my Japanese servant?" then she calls, "San, oh, San, come here San," and claps her hands. Little girl dressed as Japanese girl enters and bows. "Some tea," says the "lady of the house," and the maid, called "San" all the time, serves some tea. For the remainder, two children may play on a bearskin rug and one of them cries out. "What's the matter?" asks the first child. "Oh, I got stratched with his toothpicks!" "Those are not toothpicks, silly," laughs the other, "they are his claws." If this is too difficult, they may rush to window and exclaim, "There he goes, down the chimney!"

Parachute

This is a good charade word but rather difficult for little children. Older children will doubtless catch it and when there are smaller folks it is well to have a "whole" at the end of the charade if they cannot guess it by the scenes. This word should be managed as follows: A child picks a pear from a dish and eats it. Another child marches across the stage wearing a letter "A" and a third comes in with a toy gun and shoots at a target. Then if they cannot guess it, a little child may stand in a chair with an opened umbrella and jump from the chair with it, as one would do with a parachute.

Idolize

A simple thing is to take an old idol or to make an imitation, which has no eyes. It may be made with putty for the occasion. It has no eyes. After it has been shown alone on a little stand, someone must come in, look at it, go out and come back with a pair of artificial eyes. Black-headed hat pins, cut off close to the head, will serve. Jab these in the putty where the eyes should be, then walk off.

Checker-board

Two are playing checkers, when a third comes in, removes one checker from the board, puts it on chair or floor and with a gimlet or bit and bitstock, proceeds to bore a hole in it. (Hole may be previously made in it). This is held up. "Why, you have bored a hole right through it!" exclaimed one.

"Why did you do it?" queries the other. If they fail to guess he may say: "I wanted another checker-board (bored)."

Administer

An advertising poster may be hung up. A boy dressed as minister may come out and silently read it. Another may ask: "What are you doing?" Reply: "I am reading this 'ad'."

Melancholy

This very simple charade is not always easy to guess if properly produced. To make it all the more lively a boy may black up and dress in old clothes, come in and steal a watermelon. If watermelons are not in season a pumpkin may easily be painted to resemble one. The paint will readily wash off. After this some one comes through leading a collie dog. (Melon collie). For the "whole" if they fail to guess it, one may sit at a table, head on hand, very melancholy. Someone may ask, "What's the matter?" "I am down-hearted, I feel like the whole of this charade."

Marble

It may be difficult for young people to understand that to damage anything is to mar it, however, the word may be used to aid. A boy has a small bell. He rings it. It doesn't suit, so he takes a hammer or hatchet and proceeds to pound it and mar it. If no one guesses it, he may be asked: "Why do you mar that?" Reply: "It isn' a good bell."

Springtime

A big old-fashioned bed or upholstery spring is best. Someone brings it in. Places it on stand. Springs it up and down with hand to show that it is a spring, then leaves it. Another comes in with a small clock and places it on top of the spring and goes away.

None of these charades are "deep." They are not intended for mature minds. But as a means of entertaining a party of young folks throughout an afternoon or evening, they will serve admirably. In fact experience has taught that young folks do not care for charades that they cannot guess. A few simple ones that are easy, mixed with others, add more pleasure to the evening.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and We urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming.

Questions and Answers

FLEA BEETLE.—Can you tell me what will exterminate flea bugs? They are not much larger than a flea and resemble a flea. They cut holes in the leaves of young tobacco plants and they are also on the corn. They almost ruined the late tobacco last year. MRS. M. P., Hazel, Ky.

A.—The flea beetle is a chewing insect and can be exterminated by poisoning its food—the leaves of which it eats. Paris Green or arsenate of lead sprayed or sprinkled on the plants in exactly the same way that these poisons are used for the control of potato bugs will control these pests.

EVOPORATED FRUIT.—Please give me the method generally used by California peach growers in evaporating peaches for the market. Do you think their methods could be used successfully in Michigan to utilize the surplus crop? J. I. K., Dowagiac, Mich.

A.—There are many types of fruit evaporation but all based on the principle of forcing a current of warm dry air over the fruit, which takes up the moisture. The evaporating of peaches usually requires about eight hours. The peaches are cut in halves, pitted and placed pit side up on the racks. Formerly much of the fruit in all peach growing sections was evaporated but the low price of dried fruit forced many out of the business. There is no reason why Michigan growers may not adopt this method if it is profitable for them to do so. Much of the California fruit is sun dried. Their climate is especially favorable for this process.

GINSENG.—Please tell me if ginseng can be grown successfully in Florida. If so, where can I obtain information as to planting, cultivation, etc.?
W. S. A., Marianna, Fla.

A.—Ginseng is not native to the South hence we cannot advise its culture in your state. It is rather difficult to grow even in the North where soil and climatic conditions are favorable. Send to the U. S. Department of Agriculture for Farmers' Bulletin No. 551 on Ginseng Culture.

CLUB FEET

Made Straight In 4 Months

Annabell Williams was born with Club Feet. After other treatment had failed her mother brought her to the McLain Sanitarium at 11 years of age. Four months later they returned home—happy. Read the mother's letter:

"I took Annabell home, on May 19th, 1916, with two straight and useful feet. Today she runs and plays and takes as big a part in the fun as any child. We can't say enough for the McLain Sanitarium and their wonderful work. I will gladly answer all letters of inquiry."
MRS. MORGAN WILLIAMS,
Higbee, Mo.

In Correction of this deformity no plaster paris or General Anaesthesia was used.

Love and Spite

The noise they made must have been heard, and they waited breathless for a shout from Hugo. But they heard nothing but his steady, slow step coming nearer each instant; had they known it, fate had been on their side. As they made their flying descent Hugo had stumbled on the winding stair below, and his bruised shins had made him oblivious of anything else, for just long enough to cover their retreat! A beam of light came round the corner—to Gilbert it seemed impossible that they were not clearly visible. For one minute he was sure Hugo saw them, and was laughing in his sleeve, for he paused and looked about him.

The next Huntley drew breath, Hugo and his light had passed on.

"Now," he whispered fiercely, "get your key and we'll get through the door and into your room before he finds out she's gone. Thank Heaven, you bolted the door after us!"

Without a sound they slipped down the stairs and out into the corridor. Hugo little knew that as he tugged at the bolt that had secured his prisoner Gilbert was locking the lower door behind him, and Huntley running like mad through the empty corridors with the girl herself in his arms.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"SOMETHING WRONG!"

Gilbert, a minute behind Huntley, flew into his room, just as Jocelyn, wide-eyed and ghastly, was struggling out of Huntley's arms.

"Quick!" he cried. "Hugo will be here in a second; he is sure to suspect me or Moyra. What are we to do?"

"Give him a good licking," Lord Huntley returned savagely. "What else?"

But Jocelyn gave a little moan of terror.

"I can't face him." She staggered, and caught at Huntley's hand.

"It would be no good. Wait till the girl rests," Gilbert cried, with a despairing glance at her.

"She's right, she couldn't face him."

"L the door, then," practically.

"Never do. He knows it. Here!" he threw open the door of a big cupboard. "Miss Brown, can you get in here?" But without waiting for an answer, he took her by the arm and ran her into it.

"That's brutal—and cowardly." Huntley was savage.

But without even looking at him, Gilbert had locked the door on her and given the key to Huntley.

"Sit down. Be doing something," he ordered, flinging himself into a chair and taking out his pipe.

"She's done up. She'll faint again in there!"

"Best thing she could do. I tell you, man, you don't know Hugo! I mean to stop his game once for all."

His blood was up now. Since he must fight against his brother, he would fight well. Huntley, very pale, and only half-satisfied, stood staring at him.

"I don't see any reason——" he began, but he never finished the sentence.

Without warning the door burst open, and Hugo de Burgh stood in the room, but a Hugo that neither man had ever seen. His face was pale and distorted with passion till it no longer bore the look of a human countenance. Like a raging animal he stood glaring from one man to the other.

"What devil's work is this?" he said. "By Heaven, Gilbert, I'll teach you to play the fool in my house!" He raised the heavy silver candlestick he held and rushed at his brother.

"Hold hard, Hugo! What's the matter with you?" Huntley had caught his arm with a twist that made him drop his improvised weapon, that was heavy enough to have stretched Gilbert insensible.

"You're in it, too, are you?" Hugo could scarcely speak. "When I won't have you admitted by my servants you sneak in behind my back, do you? What business have you here?"

Shut up, Hugo, and tell me what you're talking about." Gilbert faced his brother sternly. "What do you mean by coming into my room and insulting Huntley? I brought him here, if you want to know."

At the unexpected bearing of the brother he had always bullied, Hugo, changed his tone.

"You know perfectly well what I mean," he said more quietly, but with the evil flicker still moving his upper lip. "What devil's trick have you been playing with that girl?"

"What girl?"

"You know, damn you! Miss Brown!"

"Miss Brown?" coolly. "Why—you sent her away last night."

Hugo gave a short laugh. It was well acted, but it had not the expected effect on his hearers.

"That was a tale for Moyra," he observed, with a smile that made Huntley start with anger. "Miss Brown suggested—at least, well, there's no need to explain! But the lady merely retired from public life till I could take her to London. She has been in the house all right. But I couldn't have her on intimate terms with Moyra."

"That's an absolute lie!" Gilbert said scornfully. "You never saw the girl till the other night."

"I saw her months ago," with perfect truth. "How else do you suppose she came here?"

The insinuation cost him dear.

Huntley took him by the shoulder and whirled him round to face the light.

"That's enough. I won't have it," he remarked grimly. "If you say any more I'll kick you down-stairs, if it were your own house ten times over. The thing's rotten on the face of it. If the girl is up-stairs, what are you making this row about?"

"How do you know she was up-stairs?" coolly. "I never said so. But she's gone, and I know you and Gilbert are in it. I was a fool ever to take a fancy to a girl like that. All men are the same to them."

"One more word like that, and I'll make you sicker than you ever were in your life," Huntley said, with ominous quiet. "You and I've been friends, but that's done tonight. If you ever had that girl up-stairs you know best for what reason," significantly. "I advise you to keep a quiet tongue about it for your own sake."

Hugo was quiet on the instant, suddenly seeing what mad disclosures he had made in his rage.

"You probably do know," he said, with his old, slow sneer, "not being a saint like Gilbert. "Well, the girl's gone, and I'm well rid of her. I suppose you're taking Gilbert home to dine with you?" with insolent politeness, to the man who had been used to come and go at Castle De Burgh as at his own house.

"I'm not going to dine here, if you mean that," Huntley returned icily. By George! would Hugo never go?

Mr. De Burgh was lighting a cigarette, not a trace of passion on his languid face, not a sign of his late expedition on his immaculate evening clothes.

He was listening like a hare for a sound from somewhere in the rooms, for he knew that he was being hoodwinked.

"Come here, Gilbert," he said suddenly. "I want a word with you."

Gilbert followed him into his bedroom.

"Curse you and Huntley, too!" he said, in a tone of polite conversation. "Did you let that little devil out?"

"No," ignoring the mention of Huntley.

"Then where is she?"

"Look till you find her, that's my advice," and Gilbert returned to Huntley without ceremony.

Hugo took him at his word. He ransacked the bedroom in vain.

In the sitting-room the other two stood smoking when he returned.

"If you've got her in that cupboard," he said slowly, pointing to Jocelyn's retreat, "let me tell you you're a fool for your pains." He marched to it and tried the door.

"Look here, Hugo," Gilbert was angrier than Hugo had been, "that's enough; I haven't got the key of that cupboard"—with truth—"and if I had, I'm hanged if I'd give it to you. Get out of my rooms, or behave like a rational being!"

Hugo glanced at him, then at Huntley. It would be impossible to struggle with the two, and he had already gone too far.

"I'll make you pay for this," he remarked politely, with a glance that showed his mother's son was worthy of her, and, without a word to Huntley, he went out.

"What can he do?" Huntley said contemptuously.

"It doesn't matter." Gilbert's face was weary. "I'm done with Castle De Burgh, anyhow." He went to the door Hugo had left open, and locked it.

"Get her out," he said to Huntley. He turned his back while he got some wine and biscuits from a side table. Gilbert's meals were not always the meals of Castle De Burgh; he had long been in the habit of keeping supplies in his room.

Huntley opened the cupboard, to find Jocelyn standing among Gilbert's coats, very pale, but herself.

"Is he gone?" she whispered.

Huntley nodded, leading her to a chair.

"Drink this, and eat," Gilbert said authoritatively, "then you can talk." He wished to put off the evil hour, for he knew when she told her story he would rather be dead and buried than have to believe it. With unwilling admiration he saw her quiet bearing in this strange place. Saw how like she was to dead and gone De Burghs—and to himself.

The light came into her eyes as she ate, the rose to her lips. She looked at Huntley suddenly over her glass of wine.

"I didn't mean to write," she cried softly, mindful of Gilbert across the room. "But I had to. I was afraid."

Huntley looked at her, his eyes dark with something that made her look away.

"Thank Heaven, I was here to get the letter," he said huskily. "Oh, Jocelyn."

She put down her glass.

"Mind, the note meant nothing but that I was in trouble," she said, with a curious composure.

"You are bound to nothing till you know all about me. Tell Mr. De Burgh to come nearer. I'm afraid to speak loud."

"I know all about you—and I don't care if I didn't." Huntley's voice was dogged, but he signed to Gilbert to come.

Jocelyn put up her bandaged hand to sweep back her hair, and winced with pain.

"Did Hugo do that?" Gilbert asked, his voice hard with suffering.

"No, no! He never touched me," loyally; "I did that myself. I think I fainted by the window after I broke it."

His face cleared a little. He sat down beside her and listened in silence to her quick recital of how she came to Castle De Burgh, and of all she had heard there.

Her voice never rose above a low whisper, so mindful was she of the devilish contrivance in Alicia's sitting-room, even though the cripple was now not there.

Gilbert never flinched till he heard how his mother had played eavesdropper to him. Martha's story had turned him faint that afternoon; he heard it quite quietly now.

"I knew it, nearly all," he said, as she stopped. "Richard told me this afternoon at Glen Farm." His voice was louder than he knew. Jocelyn seized his arm.

"Hush! hush! You don't know who may be listening," she breathed.

Huntley sat looking at her, wondering how she had ever done the things that had led him to think so cruelly of her. How she must have suffered, and how brave a heart she must have.

"You know everything now." She turned to him quickly. "Can you ever trust me again? You were right that night! I had been a spy."

"Trust you forever, my Jocelyn," he said, so low that Gilbert never caught the words. But Jocelyn de Burgh's cheek crimsoned with pride.

"I must go," she said abruptly. "Can you get me out?"

"Go where?" Gilbert asked.

"To my father," quietly. "I can't stay here."

"In a minute." Huntley had remembered the letter from Meredith. He spread it out on the table, and the other two bent over it. As they read, the girl's face flushed with unbelieving joy; the man's—in pity Huntley turned his eyes from Gilbert de Burgh.

"I must go now more than ever," Jocelyn said quickly. "But how can I do it?"

Gilbert glanced at her.

"Do up your hair," he said harshly, "and take my long coat and cap. You're tall enough, Hugo may not see you; if he does he'll take you for me. Huntley can go with you. I'll go and get Hugo out of the way."

He waited till she had put on his things; with the cap down over her eyes and the coat-collar, the long garment covering her short skirts, she could very well pass for him in the dimly lit house if she were only seen from the distance.

"Now, wait till I come back." He was gone at the word, and in perfect silence the two stood, scarcely thinking of each other in their pain for him.

But minute after minute passed, and he did not come.

"There's something wrong," Huntley said uneasily. He opened the door into the hall to listen. There was not a sound.

"Something wrong." Jocelyn's heart beat quickly. "What could be wrong? Unless——"

She tore off Gilbert's coat and cap. What was she thinking of, to play the coward like this?

As Huntley turned to her in surprise she held up her hand for silence.

"What was that?" she whispered.

A hoarse scream of terror, so wild and anguished that it chilled his blood, came from somewhere, the desperate outcry of deadly fear. Sick with apprehension, the girl flung down the disguise from her hand and ran down the opening into Mrs. De Burgh's bedroom.

"Come!" she whispered, standing in the open

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

RUPTURE.—I have a horse four years old that was ruptured at the navel when it was a suckling colt, and has never had anything done to it. The rupture is about the size of a man's fist. A local veterinarian wants to operate on him and says he can cure him. What is your advice? A. L. B.

A.—The operation will prove safe and effective if the veterinarian is a trained surgeon.

INFECTED WOUND.—I have a mare twelve years old that had a swelling just behind her fore legs. It burst in two or three places, and then the swelling came on her breast and has broken. The mare is hearty and has lots of life. G. W.

A.—A wound became infected and pus spread in the connective tissue. Paint swelling with tincture of iodine once daily before and after they open and give one dram of iodide of potash once daily in the drinking water for five consecutive days a week for two weeks.

SCAR.—I have a mare and last winter there was a swelling on the point of the shoulder. I blistered it three or four times; the hair came off leaving a bare place. What can I do to make the hair come back? P. B.

A.—The hair cannot be made to grow again as the hair roots have been killed. The only successful treatment would be to have the scar dissected out by a trained surgeon.

LAMENESS.—I have an eight-year-old horse that is lame in his left front foot. There is a swelling on the back part of it from the fetlock almost as far up as the cannon. Doctors say the cord is enlarged. I have applied a blister a number of times which did quite a little good then. All at once it became worse again. After standing a while he will not walk straight. He seems to be stiff in both of his hind feet, the right one being the lamer. H. F.

A.—You should have the back tendons line-fired and blistered by a competent veterinarian, as blistering alone has failed. Spavin may be the cause of lameness of the hind leg and that also should be fired and the operations followed by six weeks of rest.

LEAKING OF MILK.—I have a cow that loses her milk if not milked at noon. She gives two and one half gallons per day. Is there anything I can do to stop her losing her milk? MRS. J. C. W.

A.—Milk three times a day. If that does not stop the leaking paint the tips of the teats with flexible collodion after each milking. Stop if teats tend to become sore.

AILING COW.—I have a cow seven years old. She has a calf three months old. About four weeks ago she began to fail in her milk. She stands with her head low and her neck stretched out and belches a good deal. She jerks when she breathes. MRS. M. M.

A.—Do not use the milk as the cow may have tuberculosis which is contagious and makes the milk dangerous. Physic her with one pound of epsom salts, one cupful of salt, one cupful of molasses and three pints of warm water given very slowly and carefully from a long necked bottle. If that does no good better kill her and make an examination.

ABORTION.—I have a sow that has lost two litters of pigs. Is there any way to keep her from it? A. L. J.

A.—No there is no sure remedy and such a sow may contaminate other sows. Fit her for the butcher.

TAILBRUSH MISSING.—My three-year-old cow has a short tail. The hair on the end of it doesn't grow out. What can I do to make it grow long? MRS. L. K.

A.—The end of the tail may have been bitten off by pigs when the calf was small. If not and you think a diseased condition of the skin is present keep the part well smeared with sweet oil thickened with flowers of sulphur.

DISEASED TEETH.—I have a mare twelve years old. When she chews her feed she spits it out, slobbering while eating. In drinking she turns her head to one side. (2) There seems to be something wrong with my dog's head. He shakes his head and ears and seems weak in hind legs. His ears are filled with wax and he cannot chew. T. L. A.

A.—It is plain that the teeth are in such bad condition that the mare cannot perfectly masticate feed and this will continue unless you can have a really competent veterinarian give the teeth proper attention. Meanwhile feed night and morning one quart of black strap molasses stirred up with three quarts of hot water, cut hay, corn-meal and wheat bran. Feed whole oats at noon and some long hay at night. You may have to starve her to take the molasses feed, but she will soon take to it with a relish. (2) Treat the dog for worms as often advised here. Canker of the ears is present. Treat by twice daily cleansing the ears with peroxide of hydrogen or wood alcohol on swabs of cotton. Then lay the dog on its side, pour some of the following lotion into the ear and hold the dog down until the sediment settles into the ear. Treat the other ear in the same way, if both are affected. Ear lotion: One dram each of powdered alum and sugar of lead, two drops of carbolic acid and thirty drops of glycerine in two ounces of soft water. Shake bottle well before use.

CALLOUS.—I have a young mare that stuck something in her leg just below the knee. There was a small hole about one inch deep. She was lame a few days and the place healed over. Then the lameness was worse. Now the soreness is gone, but a small knot remains on her leg. MRS. L. H.

A.—Several times daily rub firmly downward on the lump with a tooth-brush handle and each night swab the part with a mixture of one part each of tincture of iodine and turpentine and two parts of alcohol. Do not clip off the hair or rub in this medicine. Persist in the treatment as response may be slow.

SPLINT.—I have a two-year-old colt that has a small hard lump on the inside of the front right leg on the cannon bone between the knee and the ankle. It has been there nearly a year. She has never been lame from it. I would like to know what it is and what to do for it. C. A.

A.—A splint is present and should be treated as advised for "callous" in this issue.

ECZEMA.—I have a poodle dog that has sores over her body. Before they get well they have a yellow scab and after they are well they leave a red mark. She scratches the hair off. There is a strong odor from her body. MRS. F. L.

A.—Make the dog live out of doors, take active exercise for hours every day and have but one small meal each evening. Feed no sweets or potatoes. Give a small dose of epsom salts once a week and on a different day weekly tub in a warm 1-100 solution of coal tar dip made according to directions given on the container. Once daily apply sulphur ointment to the sores.

SICK HOGS.—Will you tell me what is the matter with my hogs and what to do for them. First, they begin to cough and then in a few days have hard chills. Their eyes become sore and close and they refuse to eat. I have one pig that has hard fits when it eats and then has a chill. I have lost three nice ones. I feed them wheat bran slops and milk. MRS. J. P.

A.—It is quite likely that cholera is killing the pigs, but we cannot be sure without making an examination. Have a veterinarian examine the hogs and vaccine the well ones if he finds cholera present. In cholera red spots will be found upon the lining membrane of the bladder, the surface of the kidneys under the outer capsule, the lining of the intestines and upon other internal organs. Apart from cholera it may be stated that wheat bran should be very sparingly fed to hogs. It is too irritating and may cause indigestion and fits and possibly is the sole cause of your trouble. Change the feed.

STAGGERS.—I have a fine Shetland pony three years old. About eight months ago the pony had impacted stomach. He would stand with his hind legs stretched so far back that he would fall down. Frequently he would spin until he fell down. DR. J. D. J.

A.—Allow the pony a roomy box stall when in the stable, but never let him stand for a single day without work or exercise. Cut down rations to one pound of oats and bran per hundred pounds of body weight as a day's ration. Slightly increase the grain when the pony works. Feed one-ninth part of bran with the oats by weight. Use shavings or sawdust if the pony eats his bedding.

Unfortunate Mexico

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

MEXICO, the land of contrasts, of great riches and extreme poverty, a few of its people amassing millions while myriads are starving; a place where the most modern machinery may be found in operation at the very side of the most primitive method of accomplishing the same end, where beautiful architecture is in contrast with adobe huts and where shining automobiles of the latest design whirl past sleepy ox teams hauling carts with solid wooden slabs for wheels identical with the design which was used at the time of the Spanish conquest; these are the mixtures one finds in Mexico.

Passing down a prominent street in almost any of the large Mexican cities there may be seen fashionably dressed men who look much as though they were just as much at home in Piccadilly, the Champs d'Elysees or Fifth Avenue. Following or preceding them, however, will be a sandaled peon clad in cotton trousers and a blouse with his "serape" thrown over his shoulder his head protected by a wide-brimmed sombrero and his entire worldly possessions upon his back.

In the next block one may meet an Indian woman, barefoot and with uncovered head, a child slung in the "robosa" over her shoulders. About her there is a suggestion of garlic, onions and "pulque," while passing along the same street, comfortably ensconced in her victoria, dressed in the latest Parisian creation, rolls milady.

A gorgeously appointed funeral car, bearing the remains of one whose family can afford this expense, may arrive at the burial place simultaneously with three or four peons, packing on their shoulders the body of a comrade in a plainly painted coffin, the use of which is rented for the occasion and will be returned after the body is given interment.

Throughout the history of Mexico grotesque mixtures of races and conflicting superstitions and religious beliefs seem to have been the main cause of the constantly perturbed state of that civilization.

From the beginning of its known history Mexico has been the scene of successive racial conquests, each race making a permanent impression upon both its physical and moral characteristics.

Out of all the extraordinary mixture of races, social customs, superstitions and religions has risen the Mexico of today and its many uniquely difficult problems.

Here are a few instructive facts about old Mexico:

The area is about 767,290 miles.

Its seacoast on the Pacific and the Gulf of California is 4,574 miles.

It has 15,251 miles of railway and 46,112 miles of telegraph lines.

It is 1900 miles long from northwest to southeast; its width varies from 140 to 750 miles.

Upon the Gulf of Mexico it has a coast line of 1,[illegible] miles, and 327 miles of coast on the Caribbean Sea.

There are no large rivers in Mexico, and its lakes are small and few. Sandbars obstruct the small rivers emptying into the Gulf, making the ports upon them difficult to enter.

Vera Cruz affords only an open anchorage inside of a series of reefs. Vessels there have little or no protection from northerly gales. Tampico harbor has been made safer by jetties and the deepening of the channel.

According to the most recent estimate, the population of Mexico is a few thousand more than 15,000,000, an average of less than twenty inhabitants to the square mile.

Thirty-eight per cent of the population is Indian; forty-three per cent is of mixed bloods, or "Mestizos." Less than nineteen per cent is classed as white.

The National Library, dedicated in 1692, contains more than 225,000 volumes.

Construction of railroads leading to the United States did not begin until 1878, when Porfirio Diaz was President.

The Mexican Central and Mexican National railways were merged in 1908, with an aggregate capital of $460,000,000 Mexican money. The government holds a controlling interest in these lines, which run north from Mexico City to the American frontier.

Mexico City, the capital, is 264 miles northwest of Vera Cruz and 7,415 feet above the sea level. Its death rate has been notoriously high. Many thousands of Indians and halfbreeds live in crowded quarters, and until recent years there was a lack of drainage works and underground sewers.

There are many more than 150 manufacturing establishments, including iron working shops in Mexico City.

The finest Avenue is the Paseo de la Reforma, a broad boulevard nearly three miles long.

There is almost an unbroken regularity in the laying out of the city streets, but according to an old Spanish custom the name of the same street frequently changes from block to block.

In shape Mexico is like an enormous cornucopia, with its opening toward the United States.

Historical records prove the astonishing fact that in ninety-four years Mexico has had fifty-seven rulers.

In the year 1821 the country was still ruled by the King of Spain. The Mexicans then started to throw off the Spanish yoke and won a partial success in that year. Since then the country has had two emperors and thirty-five Presidents and dictators.

Curiously enough, seventy years ago in March, 1846, American soldiers invaded Mexican soil. The Mexican war, in spite of all the motives of aggression that dominated the United States in that struggle, would not have been fought if Santa Anna, the Pancho Villa of his day, had not butchered the heroic defenders of the Alamo in cold blood.

Just as today the brutal slaughter of Americans, at Columbus, New Mexico, is the fighting cry of America in its punitive expedition after Villa, so threescore and ten years ago was the battle cry, "Remember the Alamo."

Seven Times One

BY JEAN INGELOW.

There's no dew left on the daisies and clover,
There's no rain left in Heaven,
I've said my "seven times" over and over—
Seven times one are seven.

I am old—so old I can write a letter;
My birthday lessons are done.
The lambs play always—they know no better;
They are only one times one.

Oh, moon! In the night I have seen you sailing
And shining so round and low.
You are bright—ah, bright—but your light is failing;
You are nothing now but a bow.

You moon! Hove you done something wrong in Heaven,
That God has hidden your face?
I hope, if you have, you will soon be forgiven,
And shine again in your place.

Oh, velvet bee! You're a dusty fellow—
You've powdeed your legs with gold,
Oh, brave marsh Mary-buds, rich and yellow,
Give me your money to hold!

Oh, Columbine! Open your folded wrapper,
Where two twin turtle-doves dwell!
Oh, Cuckoopint! Toll me the purple clapper
That hangs in your clear green bell!

And show me your nest, with the young ones in it—
I will not steal them away:
I am old! You may trust me, linnet, linnet!
I am seven times one today.

I Shall Not Pass Again This Way

For several years before his death, Mr. Daniel S. Ford, the proprietor, editor and builder of the "Youth's Companion," because of delicate health, did his work and managed his mammoth business from a little room in his home in one of the beautiful parks of Boston. When loving hands cleared the plain but convenient desk there was found, in a conspicuous place, much worn with frequent handling, the following poem. If the poet had intended to describe Mr. Ford's daily words and actions he could not have done so in more appropriate language:

"The bread that bringeth strength I want to give,
The water pure that bids the thirsty live;
I want to help the fainting day by day;
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

"I want to give the oil of joy for tears
The faith to conquer crowding doubts and fears.
Beauty for ashes may I give alway;
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

"I want to give good measure running o'er,
And into angry hearts I want to pour
The answer soft that turneth wrath away!
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

"I want to give to others hope and faith,
I want to do all that the Master saith:
I want to live aright from day to day:
I am sure I shall not pass again this way."

If You Have a Friend Worth Loving

The following poem was discovered by Mr. George Morgan, of the banking firm of Morgan, Drexel & Co., in a country newspaper. He carried it in his pocket for many years, occasionally reading it to his friends.

"If you have a friend worth loving,
Love him. Yes, and let him know
That you love him, ere life's evening
Tinge his bow with sunset glow.
Why should good words ne'er be said
Of a friend—till he is dead?

If you hear a song that thrills you,
Sung by any child of song,
Praise it. Do not let the singer
Wait deserved praises long.
Why should one who thrills your heart
Lack the joy you may impart?

"If you hear a prayer that moves you
By its humble, pleading tone,
Join it. Do not let the seeker
Bow before its God alone.
Why should not your brother share
The strength of 'two or three' in prayer?

"If you see the hot tears falling
From a brother's weeping eyes
Share them. And by kindly sharing
Own our kinship in the skies.
Why should anyone be glad
When a brother's heart is sad?

"If a silvery laugh goes rippling
Through the sunshine on his face,
Share it. 'Tis the wise man's saying—
For both grief and joy a place.
There's health and goodness in the mirth
In which an honest laugh has birth.

"If your work is made more easy
By a friendly, helping hand,
Say so. Speak out brave and truly
Ere the darkness veil the land.
Should a brother workman dear
Flatter for a word of cheer?

"Scatter thus your deeds of kindness
All enriching as you go—
Leave them. Trust the Harvest-Giver;
He will make each seed to grow.
So, until the happy end,
Your life shall never lack a friend."

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

To clean mirrors and cut glass, rub with a cloth dampened in alcohol and then polish with a dry cloth. MRS. C. W. FRANK, Tawas City, Mich.

A few pieces of charcoal will keep silverware from rusting, if placed in the box where it is packed. It absorbs the moisture.

If any of the sisters make their own vinegar and have trouble in getting it clear looking, try putting in half a pint of milk to each gallon of vinegar. It will soon curdle and settle to the bottom, taking all the dregs with it. Then pour the vinegar off carefully and it will be clear.

To clean coffee stained linen, soak in cold water to which has been added a little borax.

BERTHA MAYFIELD, Cunningham, Tenn.

Try putting a little hot water in the last rinsing water. I do this and am not troubled with colds. MRS. TOM HESTER, Granite Falls, N. C.

Add a little salt to apples when cooking. It improves the flavor and requires less sugar.

To cut a cake that is iced, hold the knife in boiling water for a minute and the cake can then be cut without breaking the icing.

When hanging out clothes in cold weather, heat the clothespins in a pan in the oven and the fingers will keep warm. MRS. ELSIE M. WILLS, Arnett, W. Va.

Remedies

TONSILITIS.—Five cents' worth each of tannic acid, and chlorate of potash; powder potash, and to one teaspoon of each, add four tablespoons warm water. Gargle deep in the throat every hour.

CHILBLAINS.—First bathe the feet in as hot water as can be borne, dry thoroughly and apply a salve made of pure lard and powdered lump chalk (not crayon chalk). About one tablespoon of lard to two of chalk.

WHOOPING COUGH.—Two heaping teaspoons of flaxseed boiled in a pint of water until slimy; strain and add five cents' worth of rock candy, one teaspoon of glycerine and one half lemon; boil a few minutes longer.

CROUP.—Take two tablespoons of strong apple vinegar, a piece of alum twice the size of a pea, a full teaspoon of butter and mix together and sweeten with honey. Give as warm as the child can take it; give just a little now and then and it will soon cut the phlegm loose.

a big brother. And this was what I wanted to tell you today, to thank you for the many comforts you provided for me, and to give you a little present to remember me by."

He drew a daintily wrapped little package from his pocket, and half extended it to her.

She spurned it, but not unkindly, then for several moments stood as if stunned by what she had heard. Then she caught the hand that was about her waist in the wild clutch of a despairing woman, nursed it at her breast, then threw it from her.

"Go on," she cried, and there was in her voice and her poor English that made her despair the more pitiful and terrible, "go on back to th' gal who's waitin' fer you back East! Go to her, an' I'll try an' ferget you. I'm sorry that I lost my heart to ye, but I ain't blamin' you. You've always been straight an' decent, but oh, it hurts! It hurts!"

He took one step toward her, and attempted to soothe her. But she stood him off.

"No! No! Don't touch me! It 'ud make me fergit everything!"

She threw open the door. The first flakes of the coming storm wafted into the little room.

"Go on! Go on! I can't have ye here any more. Please go!"

He stood for a moment, his face seamed with sorrow at the result of his innocent mistake.

"Good by," he said, and he started over the snow.

Sal scarcely heard him. With the look of a crazed woman she watched with glazed eyes as he made his way through the drifts and the steadily falling snow which seemed like wanton spirits embracing the man she had lost, while the shadowy pines sighed and echoed the desolation of her heart.

When he could no longer be seen, the girl threw shut the door, and sank into a chair at the undisturbed table, a mute reminder of the ruin of her air-castle.

"Thanksgivin'," she muttered hoarsely, "thanksgivin'! Oh, heavens, ain't it a joke?"

NEARLY 1000 ACRES OF SUNFLOWERS.—Lee C. Phillips has 800 acres of sunflowers and is known as the "Sunflower King." He sells the seed to breakfast food makers. It costs him something like eight dollars per acre to grow sunflowers and he markets the seed at from three to five cents a pound. The yield per acre, Phillips says, is from $35 to $50.

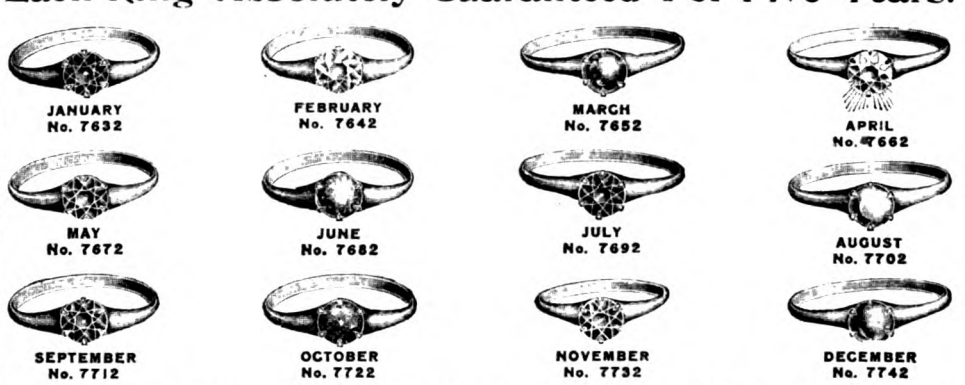
YOU HAVE A BEAUTIFUL FACE

But Your Nose?

Before After

IN THIS DAY AND AGE attention to your appearance is an absolute necessity if you expect to make the most out of life. Not only should you wish to appear as attractive as possible, for your own self-satisfaction, which is alone well worth your efforts, but you will find the world in general judging you greatly, if not wholly, by your "looks," therefore it pays to "look your best" at all times.



Permit no one to see you looking otherwise; it will injure your welfare! Upon the impression you constantly make rests the failure or success of your life. Which is to be your ultimate destiny? My new Nose-Shaper, "Trados" (Model 22) corrects now ill-shaped noses without operation, quickly, safely and permanently. Is pleasant and does not interfere with one's daily occupation, being worn at night.

Genuine Gold-Filled Birthstone Rings

Each Ring Absolutely Guaranteed For Five Years!

JANUARY No. 7632 — FEBRUARY No. 7642 — MARCH No. 7652 — APRIL No. 7662

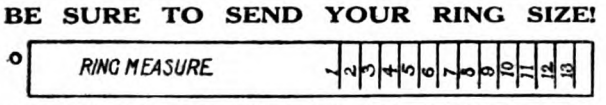
SEPTEMBER No. 7712 — OCTOBER No. 7722 — NOVEMBER No. 7732 — DECEMBER No. 7742

You May Have Your Choice For A Club Of Two!



The most popular lady's rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. There is a different stone for each month of the year and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones, the month to which each one applies and its symbol.

January, The Garnet, Symbol of Power.
February, The Ameythyst, Symbol of Pure Love.
March, The Bloodstone, Symbol of Courage.
April, The Diamond, Symbol of Purity.
May, The Emerald, Symbol of Immortality.
June, The Agate, Symbol of Health and Long Life.
July, The Ruby, Symbol of Charity.
August, The Sardonyx, Symbol of Happiness.
September, The Sapphire, Symbol of Constancy.
October, The Opal, Symbol of Hope.
November, The Topaz, Symbol of Friendship.
December, The Turquoise, Symbol of Prosperity.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine 12-Karat gold filled which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany". As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. And not only the women and girls but men and boys as well are now wearing them.

Please do not class these rings with the cheap "electro-plated" rings that turn brassy after they have been worn a month or two. Remember that every one of them is guaranteed to be 12-Karat gold-filled and positively warranted for five years. If you want a handsome birthstone ring for yourself or some dear friend or relative you will make no mistake in taking advantage of this offer at once. When ordering be sure to specify the size and number of ring wanted. You can easily tell just what size ring you wear by following the directions below.

BE SURE TO SEND YOUR RING SIZE!

By using the above diagram you can tell exactly what size ring you wear if you will follow these directions: Put a stiff piece of paper around the second joint on your ring finger. Cut the paper off so that when drawn tight around your finger the ends exactly meet. Then lay the paper flat on the diagram, one end at the line O and the other end will indicate correct size. By following these instructions your ring will be a perfect fit.

Club Offer!

FOR two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25c. each, or one three-year subscription (not your own) at 50c. we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled birthstone rings by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

NOW, Cousins, hear the turkeys, how they gobble at the thought of those Thanksgiving dinners for which they will be sought, and, when you think of them, you will have it to be thankful for that you are not turkeys, even if you have nothing else to be thankful for, though there are a great many other blessings in this world besides turkeys. However, if it weren't for Thanksgiving November would be even more dreary than it is. So there is something else to be thankful for. That's two things you've got and here is the third, which is the charm—I shall stop talking this minute and go to work answering your questions, which is, however, very pleasant work.

The first letter I take up is from Worried Jane of Uvalde, Texas and she is worried because she has a sweetheart who is too timid to tell her whether he cares more for her than he does for another girl he goes with, at least, she thinks he is too timid to tell her. Besides he tells her if she will let him kiss her it will strengthen his love. That doesn't sound very timid, does it? Really, the only cure I know for a young man like that is for a girl to square up with him by having another young man for whom she cares just as much as she does for the first one. Maybe she doesn't, but she should make the first one believe so and he will very soon find out which girl he likes best and will say so. But Jane says she is "foolish" about this young man, and of course, when a girl gets that way she needs a cure more than the timid swain does. Hoity, toity, the course of true love never did run smooth and I don't know how to smooth it.

No Name, Goodes Ferry, Va.—A young man of thirty has no right to talk to a girl of twenty about the future. He should talk about the present and talk it seriously, thirty is not a boy's age. It is just the proper age for the girl of twenty and when he says to you again that you two should marry, or quit, you brace up and tell him you will quit unless he says something to prevent it and not wait for the future to say it, either. If he wants to dilly-dally, let him dilly-dally with some other girl. He's old enough to know better and you should teach him. If you marry him you will have to tell him more than once to go along and bring in the firewood. He's that kind.

Jolly B., Ledgewood, N. J.—Sometimes Jews and Chistians marry and usually when they do the marriage is quite satisfactory, but such a marriage should not be undertaken unless both parties understand thoroughly all the conditions. An orthodox Jew cannot marry a Christian and remain orthodox. There are many Jews who are not orthodox who marry Christians but remain Jews, while some renounce Judaism and become Christians. My advice to you would be to find your future husband in your own faith. Wait until you are twenty-five and study it out yourself.

Wild Rose, Adrian, N. Y.—First, my dear, you should not spell it "keaping," and you shouldn't write it "have went." Did you learn those things in the Adrian schools? Don't bother about the young man until you are at least twenty. And don't let him kiss you in public, or in private. Don't you know better? You are too young for an engagement ring and if he had good sound sense he would not have given it to you. Your mother shows very poor judgment in permitting you to have love affairs until you are done with school.

Reader, Farmdale, Mass.—You may hold to old-fashioned views of promiscuous kissing, but they are entirely correct and it is a pity and often a shame that every girl doesn't think and act as you do. No matter how modern the world becomes, hold fast to your old-fashioned ideas and do not let your kisses go to any man but the chosen one for all time. I have never in all my life known a girl who lost the respect of men because she would not permit herself to be kissed by them. You had much better be an unkissed old maid than an over-kissed married woman. You are wise, too, in preferring no company to the company of men who are no credit to you, nor to society. Hold to that and you will never regret it. Many a girl has been lost because she disregarded this plain wisdom.

Blonde and Brunette, Dickinson, N. Y.—Don't go as far as half way, even, because he is bashful. If he has to be coaxed, you don't want him. And don't write to find out why your correspondent hasn't written, unless you want him to think you are over-anxious. He'll write when he wants to and your writing to him again won't make him want to.

Troubled, Le Sueur, Minn.—You should insist upon his apologizing for the slights he gave you, at your home and at his, and if he has nothing to say satisfactorily explaining his conduct, you should break the engagement. You may patch it up this time, but if it occurs again, you will be making a serious mistake if you don't break it and keep it broken.

Peggy, Hattiesburg, Miss.—The question as to whether you should wear the ring given to you by a young man, since married, because he asked you to wear it, whatever happened between you, or not to wear it because your present sweetheart asks you not to, is just a little perplexing now, but if you become engaged to this one, I think you should not wear the other man's ring, even if you do consider it as much your property as if you had bought it. It may be that, but as you do not care at all for the married man, and do, or should, care for the man you are to marry, then you should please him first. This is merely a molehill and you should not make a mountain of it.

Ruby, Geneva, Ind.—If your "gentleman friend" has no other fault than playing cards, if he isn't a gambler, your parents should let you have him as a very rare and valuable specimen of young man.

Mikery, Bano, Ark.—The young man had a right to resent your asking him if he didn't want to take another girl to church when he asked you, because you had no right to ask such a question. If you knew he wanted to go with someone else you should have merely declined his invitation. When you said you would go if the others did, he had a right to ignore the others and go to church without you. Both of you are acting silly and you must settle it to suit yourselves.

Sixteen, Burkesville, Ky.—The young man, who falls out with you on account of your belief when you join the Methodist church, is unworthy of your regard. Select a Methodist sweetheart.

Friend, Chilesburg, Ky.—If you love your books so much better than you do the boys, why don't you study your books more than you do the boys and learn to spell a little better?

Puzzled, St. Paul, Minn.—As he asked you when you were friends, to write to him if anything ever did happen to come between you so that you both might understand if possible, I think you might write to him now to know what the trouble is. Still, if he cared very much for your friendship, he would write to you for explanations, or to explain. You may do as you please, but I don't think I would write to him.

Rosebud, Decherd, Tenn.—Jealous people always think the person they like don't care for them unless they get all the attention. This makes it embarrassing where other people are around to whom some attention must be paid. Therefore if you wish to avoid this unpleasantness don't become too friendly with people of jealous disposition. If your young man is mad, let him scratch his mad place, as my old Mammy used to say.

Brown Eyes, Oshkosh, Wis.—I don't know anything about the other qualifications of the two young men who are attentive to you, but if you have any choice in the matter, don't choose the one who is "bossy." A "bossy" husband, or wife, is about the most difficult person in the world to live with, unless the other half is born to be bossed and likes it.

Bright Eyes, Perrysville, Ind.—You take a very sensible view of marriage and as the young man seems to think very much as you do, I think you will find it happier than you think it will be. It is much better to have your doubts beforehand and dispel them afterwards, than to have no doubts at all beforehand and gather lots of them afterwards. It is very much as you say, marriage is largely what people make it. Mistakes are made sometimes that no human power can remedy, but thank heaven, they are the exception. You have my best wishes and my blessing.

Twenty, Mineral Wells, Texas.—A very great many good people are not church members, and I think a girl who loves a man of that kind should risk marrying him. If she can do no more, she can show him by her own life that he is mistaken when he thinks church people are silly. You are much safer in marrying a man of this type, than you are in marrying a church member whose religious belief does not prevent his being about the most undesirable husband a woman could have. My chief objection to so-called liberal thinkers is that they think so poorly, and speak so unjustly, of church people.

Mineral, Houston, Texas.—If it will break your parents' hearts for you not to marry the rich young drunkard and gambler, then marry him and let them break their hearts over your subsequent suffering.

M. B. J., Hunt, Ill.—If you will lose your girl friend if you don't give up your sweetheart, and you will lose him if you don't give her up, you can't do anything except to strike a balance between them and choose the one you'd rather not lose.

Blondy, Schroom Lake, N. Y.—Don't marry him if you don't care enough for him to take him, whatever my advice might be. Don't marry anybody on anybody's advice, though it is wise sometimes not to marry on the advice of others. You see, not being married you are on the safe side.

M. R. D. Danville, Ky.—It is quite proper, if you have no place at home to receive callers, to receive them at your uncle's, or at any friend's house. As for the poor orphan boy whom your parents object to, you have plenty of time to think about him for several years yet and the safest plan is just to think about him and be good sensible friends. A few years hence, perhaps neither of you will be much interested in the other. Girls of your age are always in too much of a hurry to respond to their heart throbs. What you need much more is common sense throbs. You know what I always say about kissing. Why ask me if you ought to?

Anxious, Flippin, Ark.—If the young man is the proper kind of gentleman he will return your letters and presents first, trusting that you will return his. Of course, if he does not send yours, write again for them.

There, my dears, your questions have been answered quite as they should be and I hope you have another reason to be thankful. Now, run along your happy way, thankful again that you are young and life has so much for you if you seek it as you should and while you are eating your Thanksgiving dinners, think of me,

Cultivation of the Sunflower

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE new claimant for the honor of being the real Sunflower state is Arkansas. Kansas has always been the Sunflower state and will be still so so far as the title is concerned but as to the culture of the flower Arkansas has entered enthusiastically upon growing the plant not for æsthetic reasons but for economic ones.

In many states sunflowers have been long grown in gardens for their beauty and their height but now they have been given the distinction of being planted in fields. From being merely a garden pet or a back yard beauty the sunflower has been advanced to the proud position of a crop.

Sunflower growing a comparatively new industry in Arkansas, has been started in Mississippi county in that state and is now conducted on a large scale. The announcement has gone forth to the world that Arkansas will grow this year, for the first time in her history, something like a thousand acres of sunflowers. Some farmers will plant as many as one hundred acres and many fields of ten and twenty acres will be set out in sunflowers.

Missouri is something of a sunflower state, but this is not generally known; but the sunflower has been one of the field crops for over fifteen years. The reason for the extension of sunflower cultivation is because the use of the seed of the flower is extensive and because there has been a marked decline in the receipt of sunflower seed from Russia, which country at the breaking out of the war furnished about eighty per cent of the seed consumed in the United States.

Sunflower seed is used extensively for poultry food and is considered very nutritious. Different kinds of oils are extracted from the seed, and last year was used largely as a substitute for cottonseed products. The poultry business is growing throughout the United States, and the extension of that industry accounts in a great measure for the increasing demand for sunflower seed.

The yield of seed runs from about eight hundred to fifteen hundred pounds an acre, and though the average price of the seed in the thrashing field is four or five cents a pound, the price has recently been up to fifteen cents a pound. It is reported that a sunflower crop is an easy one to cultivate. An expert has said that the labor required to grow ten acres of cotton or corn will be ample for forty acres of sunflowers. One or two cultivations is all that is required, and the thrashing is a small part of the crop labor. The rows are planted north and south, and when the heads mature a wagon is driven along the rows and the heads cut off with a corn knife, falling into the wagon, where a man or a boy strikes them against the wagon bed, shelling the seed out. The seed is then put in a dry place, and finally fanned, sacked and marketed.

Then too the sunflower, it seems, is used for numberless purposes by different nations. In this country it is considered valuable in the construction of battleships, the stalks being pithy and when compressed in blocks the pith absorbs a tremendous quantity of water.

These blocks are made to line the battleships' sides and placed between two walls of steel.

When it comes to the manufacture of cigars there is not a part of the plant without commercial value.

In Russia, where the seed is raised by the millions of pounds each year it is made into quite an eatable oil, while the residue is turned into seedcake for the cattle. The blossoms furnish honey and after that an excellent yellow dye.

The Chinese are successful in getting from the stalks a silky fiber.

A Corner for Boys

By Uncle John

WELL boys, another year has rolled around and Thanksgiving Day with its beautiful significance and bounteous feasts hovers near. Unless we are lost in selfishness and worldly ambition we can find plenty of reason to be thankful, no matter who or what we are. The very air we breathe and the earth we tread are gifts of Nature and every animate and inanimate thing contributes in some way to our welfare. If there is any fault, it is with ourselves. Perhaps we have abused our bodies and are sick. Perhaps we are thinking of what others have to be thankful for and are overlooking our own advantages or rashly conclude that we have not been squarely dealt with because we have some impediment or defect. This is nonsense and base ingratitude. You are endowed with great qualities but they will avail nothing if you sit down and whine and let them rust. "Nothing happens to a man which he is not fitted by nature to bear." Live your own life bravely. Think of the manifold good things you are enjoying. Look at the doughnut not the hole.

Skating Sail

This sail is held with outstretched arms to catch the wind and is tilted and moved by the skater to govern his speed and direction. It is made of canvas or any heavy fabric. Begin by cutting out the pattern shown in Fig. 2, allowing for a two-inch hem at each end. This hemming had better be left to your mother or sister. The oblong patch in the center reinforces that part that is slit to let the hands through. A light cane pole is run through the hem at each end. At the center, on the reverse side, part of the hem is cut away so that the hand may grasp the pole. This is shown in Fig. 3. In the same view, "s" is the slit; "u" is the exposed part of the pole; "t" is the hem; "r" is the seam and "p" is an extra patch, sewed around its edge, to form a pocket for the end of the cane pole which runs across the sail. See "b" to get this idea clear. This sail has novel features not found in any others. It can be quickly taken apart and rolled up like a curtain. In extremely cold weather it serves well as a windshield and when the wind and ice are right, it will take you along at a good rate of speed.

SKATING SAIL.

Bookcase

It is really difficult to put good lucks into a bookcase but in this design, I think we have fairly well succeeded. Select hard wood; such as oak or walnut is, of course, the best material, but yellow pine is pretty and can be finished in a variety of ways. Fig. 2 is a front view and Fig. 3 a side view. Let us make the ends first. Select board with reference to having a pretty grain for the outside and glue an eight-inch and a six-inch together to get the necessary width. The pieces must be perfectly fitted to make a good glue joint. First apply a thin coating of liquid glue and let it dry in, then have your pieces in the clamps and as soon as the second thin coat is applied to the edges that will touch tighten the clamps and weight the boards down. When set, carefully mark the top and bottom lines. Saw a little outside your marking and trim to it by rubbing with sandpaper. The rear edge is rabbeted to receive to back board. This work is done with a wood chisel or may be ordered done at the mill. The rabbet is marked "c" in Fig. 4 and the back board "b." The groove "a" is for the end of the shelf. It is one quarter inch deep and is quite easy to cut with saw and chisel. If you prefer you can dispense with shelf grooves and fasten your shelves with iron brackets as shown by Fig. 8. The back of the bookcase may be cheaper material such as No. 2 pine, one half-inch thick. The top piece is of yellow pine. In Fig. 6 our first assembling is complete. Next put the shelves in place. The top and bottom shelf are 14 inches wide and must be put in as in Fig. 5. The others are seven eighths inches less in width. In buying material for the door frames have it rabbeted to receive glass. Make two doors that will just fill the space or frame made by the top, bottom and two sides. You may have one large piece of glass in each door if you do not like the small panes. A door, to close properly, should have a slight bevel, that is, the edge is slanting, being smaller on the inside. Use four brass hinges on each door. They should be nickel plated and measure one and one half inch by two inches. They are screwed to the edges of the door and sunk their own depth into the wood. Only the ball of the hinge is visible when the door is closed.

In finishing yellow pine, simply apply three or four coats of varnish, the first and second thinned one half and one quarter with pure turpentine and the third and fourth full strength. If there are any rough spots, sandpaper very lightly between coats. If you like oak stain put it on (two coats) after the first coat of varnish. Wax makes a more satiny and less glary finish than varnish.

Rescuing a Playmate

The most overworked word of our day is "preparedness," but it describes a most desirable condition. What would you do if one of your companions broke through the ice and began to helplessly flounder and sink? The picture shows how a brave and resourceful boy rescued his chum from a watery grave. His first act was to drag up a plank that was close by, then he crawled out to the edge of the hole, quickly doffed his overcoat and tossed one end of it to the struggling lad and, with the assistance of a few friends, dragged him out to safety. I think this is a good method of going about a rescue under like cicumstances. By forming the human chain, there is little danger to any of the rescuers, provided the last boys have solid footing. The plank ic a great help and adds safety to the stunt but it is not an absolute necessity. Practise it frequently and be prepared for the emergency that may arise. It is shock that robs one of his strength and when you know just what to do, little shock is experienced.

Riddles

What is that which goes from one town to another without moving?
The road.

Why is a red light on a railroad track like a tired dog's tail?
One stops a train; the other stops a-waggin (a wagon).

Why is a man who says he cannot stand up or sit down very peculiar?
Because if he tells the truth he lies.

What is the difference between a farmer and the sun?
One raises produce; the other produces rays.

Who is the first man mentioned in every book?
Chap I.

Plus and Minus Puzzle

This might be called a plus and minus puzzle. To solve it, you write out the name of the first object pictured and subtract the following one, or rather the letters that spell it. This will give you one or more permanent letters and by continuing the adding and substracting process, according to the signs, you will finally get two words which describe something that happens every four years in the United States, in the month of November.

Presidential Election.

Some of the articles described this month might be used for gifts. Nothing is more precious to a dear friend than a piece of our own handiwork. Omitting all consideration of intrinsic value, which, in hand-made articles, is generally a point of superiority, and thinking only of the ethical and sentimental worth of such gifts, we can truthfully say that no other kind is so deeply appreciated by the recipient. Just as we would value a letter from a dear friend more than we would the privilege of reading a piece he clipped from the public press so do we more highly esteem the long, long thoughts of love his handiwork expresses more than the formal of fleeting inspiration that might have caused him to buy us something. But above all, if you do make anything to give away, let it be your very best effort.

UNCLE JOHN.

Drake turned to Pierce. "You here yet?" he asked roughly, and Pierce, shrugging his shoulders contemptuously, left the apartment.

His anger spent, Drake sat down weakly. He knew now that he had treated his wife unforgivably. He should have been more moderate. He should have waited till they were alone before creating such a scene.

He went to her door and called her name, once, twice. There was no response. He glanced uneasily at his watch. He could imagine Jenkins cursing him for his delay. Promising himself a speedy return and a petition for forgiveness, he went out of the house.

Upon the departure of Drake's taxi-cab, Pierce reentered the apartment. He, too, called softly at Julia's door once, twice. At last it swung open and, her eyes downcast, Julia emerged.

Pierce took an eager step toward her. "Adorable!" He would have drawn her to himself but Julia repulsed him.

"Hurry into your motor boots, dear! Let me help. Here is your wrap. Edith will be wondering what has become of us."

She hesitated. It was obvious that Pierce's matter-of-fact manner was calming her.

"Drake sounded brutal, but you must make allowance for him. He is unaccustomed to things up h[illegible] for one thing, and he is working like a fiend."

She fluttered toward her wrap.

"We will just look in and have one whirl. You can be in bed long before Drake's return. Unless you wish, he need never know that you went; I should tell him, though. He will laugh at his outburst tomorrow."

What had taken place in the time that intervened between Drake's leaving his office and his return to it, Jenkins could not fathom. Each was relieved when, the business finished, the time came to drive Jenkins to the station. Drake did not wait for the departure of the train but drove home without delay.

The place was very silent as he let himself in, the servants, long since, having gone to their quarters.

"Let me in, dear," he pleaded vainly at Julia's door. Not for worlds would he have entered unbidden. Finally he went back to the waning fire and sat down to think.

How long he remained there waiting for some sign from the inner room, he did not know, but presently he was aroused by the closing of a door. He glanced up, surprised, as the draperies moved apart to admit Julia, the voluptuous queen incarnate, and Pierce, who was following.

For once Drake's mind functioned slowly but when he had grasped the situation he rose with the force of a released spring. Julia gave a startled cry and Pierce fell back a step.

"What does this mean?" Drake demanded. He was very quiet but the two could not discount his earnestness.

"It means," Julia returned, summoning her

Winifred Worth's Crochet And Tatting Book

For One Subscription Premium No. 7321

Containing Sixty-three Beautiful Half Tone Illustrations of New Fashionable Designs In Crochet And Tatting With Complete Instructions for Making.

EVERY woman who is interested in crocheting and tatting should have a copy of this new book written by Winifred Worth and containing many designs used by the nuns in convents now published for the first time. The book is of good size measuring 8 inches by 10½ inches, printed on fine quality coated book paper and consists of 28 pages on which are shown sixty-three, large, clear half-tone illustrations with full and explicit directions for crocheting the prettiest edgings, beadings, insertions, towel ends, doilies, etc., besides a splendid variety of new, dainty designs in tatting with the necessary instructions. The art of combining Venetian crochet and tatting is fully explained.

This book also gives sizes of hooks best adapted for the different sizes of crochet threads, the abbreviations of all of the principal crochet stitches and terms used in tatting and tells how the different stitches are made such as the chain stitch, double crochet, half treble, double treble, treble crochet, cluster and open mesh stitches. Among the many crochet edgings, beadings, and insertions illustrated and described are the clover leaf, Irish, picot, cross-bar, half-shell, half-wheel, K-stitch and filet edgings; festoon, Irish, fence-row, picot and shell beadings; mile-a-minute, half-shell, clover leaf, filet and monkey-face insertions; butterfly wings, Van Dyke Point, nuns' pattern and many others. The tatting motifs are varied and beautiful, consisting of beadings, edgings and insertions for table mats, bedspreads, curtains, guest towels, coin-purses, night-gown yokes, bath towels, sash curtains, ribbon holders, plate doilies, etc., etc.

We will send you free and postpaid this book of the loveliest fashions in beautiful lace work with simple and complete directions which you can easily follow upon the terms of the following special offer.

Offer No. 7321A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents, we will send you this book of crocheting and tatting designs with directions free by mail postpaid.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

R. M. R., Paris, Tenn.—For information about public lands write to Commissioner of the Land Office, Washington, D. C. Inquire also of him about state and railroad lands. All things considered, if you are a good farmer, you will do better to buy improved land than to take the unimproved, and improved land can be had in many parts of the country at very reasonable rates. But don't take any land until you have seen it and know something about the section in which you think you would like to live. A farm not so good in a healthy, well-populated region is worth more for a home than the richest farm in an unhealthy, thinly populated region. It isn't the money you can make on a farm, but the good, healthy living that you and your family can get out of it that counts.

Mrs. B. C., Raymond, Minn.—To you and to all COMFORT readers having copies of that moss-grown fake The Ulster County Gazette, date 1800, containing Washington's address and other matters, we want to say again as we have often said before that it is a copy of the original made to sell to the gullible and it has no value whatever. All of you will learn more in five minutes by reading COMFORT than you will learn in five hundred years reading The Ulster County Gazette, allowing that everybody has already read Mr. Washington's well-known farewell address.

M. V T., Honolulu, Oahu.—There is no "best" remedy for a man who drinks heavily. There are some men who drink heavily, who can and do overcome it, and there are others whom the drink conquers and destroys. A great deal, if not all, depends upon the drinker. This is admitted by all specialists who treat alcoholism, and they say that while they can usually stop the man from drinking, they cannot keep him stopped. That part is for him to do, and if he slips after he has once had his system thoroughly dealcoholized they say he is sure to be destroyed, and that in a short time. The drink habit, once fixed on man or woman, is a fearful curse, and we are sometimes inclined to think that nothing short of divine interposition can effect a cure.

E. R. C., Tippecanoe, Ohio.—Specimens of animate or inanimate nature, supposed to be rare, have no commercial value, ordinarily though their scientific value may be considerable, and about the only thing you can do with the strange worm you have found, but which may not be strange to the scientists, is to send it to the nearest college and donate it to the college museum of natural history. Now and then a collector will pay a good price for some particular specimen he wants, but such collectors are as difficult to find as the rare specimens are.

F. A. C., Cavendish, Idaho.—For legal information, as well as other kinds, which you want to be authoritative, about government land, write to Commissioner of the Land Office, Washington, D. C.

R. A. F., Georgetown, Conn.—A Five and Ten Cent Store is not a bad idea at all in a small town and many of them are quite popular and profitable, but the person who makes a success of such a store must know how to do business and cannot hope to make one go, merely by having enough money to buy stock enough to start with and being told by somebody how to run it. It is like doing anything else successfully—the person doing it must know how. You don't know how, or you would not be asking us the questions you do, and we advise that you keep out of it until you have given the subject thorough study.

Miss M. E. G., York, S. C.—We do not know of a poorer market in which to make money, than that of trying to sell poetry. If you can find editors who will publish it merely as a compliment to you, you will do better than a great many beginning poets are doing, or have ever done. A few great poets and some poets who have a vogue in the popular periodicals can sell their poetry—a very few indeed, say that they can make some money out of their work, but not one in a thousand can do that. If you want to test the truth of our words, send two or three of your shorter poems to editors of such magazines as you know use the same kind of verse as you write and see what they do with it, always enclosing a stamped envelope for return if not available. It may possibly be that you have the real poetic genius and your poetry is of the highest type, but if it is, the editors will know and they will let you know very quickly. One thing you must remember is that one rejection, or two, or two dozen, must not discourage you. Keep sending as long as you have the money to pay postage. Let us know what success you have after three or four months of effort.

M. L. E., Sisseton, S. Dak.—If you are not sufficiently well informed in literary matters to know the names of prominent publishers and periodicals buying stories and to know whether they are reliable or not, our advice to you is not to waste your time, stationery, labor and postage in sending your stories to them. They buy only from skilled writers and as there are now 20,000 writers who are skilled, those who are not have no chance whatever.

E. H., Oakdale, Ill.—Write to the Commissioner of Patents, Washington, D. C. for the necessary blanks and information to make out an application for a patent. If you need an attorney, as you may before you have got the patent, there is a list of registered patent attorneys who are reliable though the Patent Office will not recommend any one of them more than another.

Mrs. C. N., Newkirk, Mont.—The resilvering of a mirror is to be properly done only by an experienced person. It will be cheaper and very much better, unless you know just how to do it and have the proper materials for resilvering.

M. H., Danbury, Wis.—Typewriting to do at home will be very hard to get, seeing that there are so many typists willing to go after it. We should say that if you could get it at all, your best way would be to carry an advertisement in your local newspapers. That would bring you to public notice and to the notice of those who might need your services. (2) Don't try writing articles or stories for magazines until you know the magazines well enough, from having read them, to know what their needs are and whether you could meet them or not.

G. D. A., Bradshaw, Nebr.—Your state has a Widow-Mothers' Pension law and any of your town or county officials should be able to tell you how to apply for it. Procedure varies in different states and you must get local information. An attorney might get it for you, if it could be had, and he would probably not charge you for his services.

Mrs. L. H., Mize, Ky.—The most difficult part of your wagon journey from Kentucky to Florida will be from Morgan county to Cumberland Gap as the worst roads and least traveled by automobiles are in eastern Kentucky. In that section your best roads we should say will be from county-seat to county-seat, going by way of Breathitt, Leslie and Bell. You can get road maps from Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago, and after leaving the Gap, in every town where there is a garage you can learn what the best road is to the next town on your way. If you are good at talking, as most women are, you won't need any map except a good ordinary one of the states between Kentucky and Florida. With that before you and the questions you can ask along the road you ought to be able to pull through safely and in fair time, say two months. It will cost less to go by rail, but will not be so interesting.

Mrs. L. S., Bayou Chene, La.—We know of no Soldiers' Home where the wives of soldiers are also admitted. If your husband has a clear record he should be able to get into a Home without difficulty. Write to Secretary of War, Washington, D. C. for information in detail. Ask about the wives.

Mrs. A. H., Creston, Mont.—Starting an employment bureau is like starting any other business, or doing any other kind of work—if you don't know how, the chances are that it will fail. Did you ever try to do anything that you didn't know how to do and do it right? You've got to learn. Go around your town and see if an employment bureau is needed. If it is, take a room, put up your sign and advertise your business in the local newspapers. Maine is too far from Montana for us to know, if you need a local license, or not. Ask one of your town officials.

Mrs. H. S. S., Waterloo, Iowa.—We cannot instruct you in the making of wall paper portieres. They belong as far as we know, to that large class of home-made articles of use and ornament which every woman makes to suit herself after she has seen how some other woman makes them. Make inquiries and observations around the homes of Waterloo and then construct your own as you please.

Mrs. R. G. T., Silt, Colo.—Once upon a time in the days of superstition and other phoney notions, a baby born with a veil was supposed to possess supernatural powers, but in these days of twentieth century progress and development all that sort of thing has passed away. The baby born with a veil is no luckier, or unluckier, than any other kind of baby.

W. M. K., Montezuma, Kans.—The better way to learn Spanish is to take lessons in a class where all the conversation is in the language you are studying. The education of the ear is as important as the education of the tongue. It is easy to learn to read a language, but difficult to learn to speak, so you need all the conversation you can get. While you are learning to speak, you should read a Spanish newspaper and also read good Spanish novels in order to increase your vocabulary and your knowledge of construction and idioms. Correspondence schools also give good courses in Spanish even to teaching the pronunciation by means of phonograph records.

L. V. C., Crabtree, Ark.—In coloring whitewash, your own taste is the rule to go by. Put in as much lampblack as will bring the white to the shade of gray you want. Try it out on a board, or shingle. Spanish brown, yellow ochre and indigo give good colors, but do not use green as the lime destroys the color.

G. O. P., Medina, N. Y.—It is not easy to keep cider sweet indefinitely. There are many methods adopted by cider drinkers. One is to put a handful of common clay into the barrel; another is to put in two or three pounds of powdered charcoal; a third calls for a gill of mustard seed to the barrel. You may take your choice, but we give no guarantee. Another plan is to let the cider work until it is of the right taste and then add a tumbler and a half of grated horse-radish to each barrel. Let it remain for a couple or three weeks and rack off and bung up closely in kegs or barrels. Right here we want to say that modern experts in intemperance say that cider drunkards are the most hopeless of all kinds and that an excess of cider stupefies and dulls the drinker to a condition for which there is no relief but death.

To a number of inquirers who want to know about coins we wish to say that we are not coin experts, but there are firms advertising in COMFORT who are and who are reliable and if they will submit their inquiries to them they will get the information they seek.

Mrs. B. G., Mobile, Ala.—The decision in the case of the blowing up of the Maine was that the explosion was from the outside, but no decision was reached as to who was guilty.

Mrs. H. M. J., Bogota, Ill.—Mr. Charles E. Hughes is a member of the Baptist church in good and regular standing.

Specializing

The need of specializing or giving one's whole energy and ability to a particular kind of work is more apparent every day, because as time goes on, the requirements of a civilized people become more varied and complex. In the old days, agriculture was the principal pursuit of mankind and every farmer was a jack-of-all-trades but, in every community, certain men excelled in certain lines of work and their neighbors employed them to work in the branch in which they were expert. Thus trades were developed. In the course of time good tradesmen got so much business that they had to have assistants, and with the constant increase of population, the cross roads shop grew into a factory. In the factories it again became evident that a helper could do one thing well and perhaps could never learn to do another part of the same work, so the boss, to profit himself, kept him at the task that he did well. This kind of evolution has been going on for centuries until now, no man is expected to do more than one thing, but he is expected to do that, perfectly. As early as possible you should make up your mind what line of work you will follow and then bend all your energy to perfecting yourself in that line. As an example of modern specialization, I call your attention to two artists of my home town. One paints dogs exclusively and the other draws absolutely nothing but bank buildings. Each of them has far more work than he can attend to. Can you guess the reason? Is it because they do one thing only? No. It is because they do one thing well.

CHRISTMAS OUTFIT FREE

THE first figure of the above two lines is a word; the next four figures spell a word; the next two figures spell a word; the last ten spell another word. These four words form a sentence which will interest you. This most interesting puzzle can be solved with a little study as follows. There are twenty-six letters in the alphabet and we have used figures in spelling the four words instead of letters. Letter A is number 1, B number 2, C number 3, etc., throughout the alphabet. IF YOU CAN SPELL OUT THESE FOUR WORDS WE WILL SEND YOU A SURPRISE OUTFIT CONTAINING A BEAUTIFUL ASSORTMENT OF 39 CHRISTMAS SEALS, TAGS, STICKERS, POST CARDS, ETC., ALL EMBOSSED IN COLORS AND BEAUTIFUL EXAMPLES OF THE LATEST CHRISTMAS DESIGNS, also a copy of a New York Magazine. All you have to do is to enclose with your answer 2 two-cent stamps to cover cost of packing, mailing, etc. Try and make out the four words. ACT QUICKLY. Write the four words on a slip of paper, mail it immediately with your name and address and 4 cents in stamps. And you will promptly receive as your reward this SURPRISE PACKET, which is a handsome assortment of 39 SEALS, TAGS, STICKERS, POST CARDS, etc., enough for all your Christmas packages. 26-Piece Daisy SILVER SET

Premium No. 680

Sent To You Prepaid For A Club Of Six

WE have in the past made many offers of table ware, but this is the first time we have ever been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for such a small club of subscriptions. And please don't think that because we are giving away this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. This Set which we offer you here is plated on a white metal base therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and decorated with the beautiful Daisy design which is now so popular and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished.

WARRANTED FOR FIVE YEARS

It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have ever offered, in fact we are so sure that it will please and satisfy all who accept this offer we are going to guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this beautiful 26-Piece Daisy Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Daisy Table Set Free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 680.

TRUE poet of the provinces was James Whitcomb Riley, who died in Indianapolis Saturday night, the 22nd of July. Born of the Middle West, he sang the joys, sorrows, fancies and humors of its folk, largely in its own dialect, and the world was touched by his inspiration and the realism of his homely symbols that he was one of the few that, devoting their lives to poetry, has gained a fortune.

Mr. Riley was peculiarly sensitive to the advance of age, and evaded inquiries as to the date of his birth; but the most accurate information available indicated that he was born in 1848. "Should you ask him his age," one of his friends said, "he would answer 'that he was this side of forty,' and leave you to guess which side."

The poet was the son of Reuben A. Riley, a lawyer and political speaker of Greenfield, Ind. The younger Riley could not be brought to the dull routine of school days, but he was wise in the lore of streams and fields. His mother, who was Elizabeth Marine before her marriage, was a writer of verse. Instead of preparing for the practise of law, as his father wished, the son apparently prepared for nothing, and when he left home he turned itinerant sign painter to make his living. What he carried from the little schoolhouse was some sympathetic knowledge of literature, imported by his teacher, Lee O. Harris, himself a poet.

For ten years Riley roved the Ohio valley, painting commercial signs on fences and farm buildings. He had the trick of brush and pencil, and cleverly drew sketches illustrative of the virtues of merchandise advertised in the signs he and his fellow-artisans made to bloom on the roadsides. He was naturally musical, and shone as a fiddler in the villages at which his party stopped at night. He played for dances and at concerts in the country hotels, and he wrote rhymes which sometimes found their way into the country newspapers.

He led this cheerful, free and easy life until late in the '70s, when he took employment as a writer for a newspaper at Anderson, Ind. He had now begun to write verse steadily, but with little encouragement from publishers. In 1877, for the purpose, as he said, of proving that he could write poetry of value, he perpetrated "the Poe hoax," which for years was a literary sensation, which he often regretted, and of which, as he often told his friends, he knew he would never hear the last.

By an arrangement with Oscar Henderson, Mr. Riley wrote and Mr. Henderson printed, a poem in the style of Edgar Allen Poe, to which he gave the characteristic title of "Leonanie," and it was offered to the public as a hitherto unpublished product of the genius of Poe.

This poem, it was stated, had been found written on the flyleaf of a copy of Ainsworth's dictionary. A traveler had discovered the treasure in the sitting-room of an old inn near Richmond, Va., and had taken it away with him. The publication of the poem and the accompanying story excited interest throughout the country, and Mr. Henderson was called upon to produce the book in which it was written. Mr. Riley obtained a copy of Ainsworth's Dictionary, and upon a flyleaf Samuel Richards, a painter, wrote in it, the poem in imitation of the chirography of Poe. One of the stanzas is:

"Leonanie—angels named her,
And they took the light
Of the laughing stars and framed her
In a smile of white.
And they made her hair of gloomy
Midnight and her eyes of bloomy
Moonshine, and they brought her to me
In the solemn night."

In some quarters the poem was accepted as genuine; in others it was denounced as a fraud, and its alleged discoverers as impostors. After the controversy had waged for months Riley confessed. William Cullen Bryant, then editor of the New York Evening Post, was particularly severe in denunciation of the hoax. Riley shouldered the burden and returned to sign painting. For a time he traveled as a sort of minstrel with a patent medicine vendor and played the violin to attract crowds to be solicited to buy nostrums.

In the early '80s Mr. Riley settled in Indianapolis, and began writing verses in "Hoosier dialect" for the Indianapolis Journel for a small salary. He sent some of his poems to Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, and they received his praise. A volume was published and the "Hoosier Poet" began to win a public. He was a graphic reader of his own verses and for the following fifteen years, or until 1898, he made tours of the country, appearing in public entertainments with great success both alone and in association with the humorist, Bill Nye, who was his intimate friend.

Publication of books of poems year after year brought Mr. Riley wealth and wide recognition of his literary genius, and not only of the genre form. Many of his poems are imaginative or gently philosophic.

In 1902 he received the degree of Master of Arts from Yale University and in 1904 the University of Pennsylvania conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Letters. Indiana University conferred the honorary degree of LL.D. on him in 1907.

In July, 1911, the poet presented to the city of Indianapolis property valued at $75,000 for a site for a public library and school administration building.

Mr. Riley never married, but he was a lover of children, whose spirit he divined so intimately, and of family life. Many of the last years of his life he spent in the home of friends in a secluded neighborhood of Indianapolis—Lockerbie street—which, he immortalized in verse:

"Such a dear little street, it is, nestled away
From the noise of the city and the heat of the day,
In cool shady coverts of whispering trees,
With their leaves lifted up to shake hands with the breeze,
Which, in all its wide wanderings, never may meet
With a resting place fairer than Lockerbie street."

NEWSPAPER USES SIMPLIFIED SPELLING.—Simplified spelling of 12 words recommended by the National Educational Association was adopted by The Philadelphia North American. The words are: tho, altho, thru, thruout, thoro, thoroly, thorofare, program, prolog, catalog, pedagog, and decalog. Use of these spellings, the newspaper says, has been advocated by the simplified spelling board as the lead to a greater reform.

THOUSAND-YEAR-OLD EGG.—Strictly fresh eggs cost sometimes over 60 cents a dozen. Usually the price is a matter of age, the older the cheaper; but not always. Mrs. Robert Gilfort of Orange, N. J., had an egg thousands of years old. Recently, Mrs. Gilfort sold it to the Denver Museum for $1,000. It was an egg of the æpyornis, an extinct ostrich-like bird, and the most perfect specimen in existence.

TONS OF BIBLES.—The first consignment of 200,000 Bibles printed in German, Hungarian, Polish, and Bohemian has left England for prisoners of war in Russia, the Swedish Red Cross Committee having obtained permission from the Swedish Government to transmit them free over the State Railways. The consignment, which had been prepared by the British and Foreign Bible Society, weighed 11 tons, and its value was over $5,000.

Barking Dog

Premium No. 7422

For A Club Of Two!

YOU simply press down gently on top of "doggie's" head and he opens his mouth and barks right out loud. And not only does he bark like a real dog but he looks like one. With his alert sparkling eyes, "bat" ears, and snubby upturned nose he is the perfect likeness of a cute little bull terrier pup. He is pure white with brown spots, and sitting on his haunches as you see him in the picture he measures over six inches high. His body, head and legs are made of practically indestructible material covered with soft thick felt; the marvelous mechanism in the throat that produces the bark is so constructed that it will not easily get out of order.

These wonderful barking dogs come from Japan where they make some of the finest mechanical toys in the world. In spite of the war we managed to import a limited quantity of them and while they last we are going to send them free to COMFORT homes where there are little boys and girls. Doggie looks so lifelike and his sharp yelping bark sounds so natural we know he will surely delight the children more than anything else you could possibly get for them. We will send you this fine barking dog exactly as illustrated and described free upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer: For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or one three-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents we will send you this cute novelty, Barking Dog free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7422.

Big Package Beautiful Christmas Novelties!

Premium No. 7931

All Sent Postpaid To You For Only One Subscription

Also An Exquisite Christmas Calendar For 1917!

All the latest new style Christmas novelties, beautifully printed and embossed on superfine paper in gold, purple, crimson, holly-green and all the colors of the rainbow. The use of these dainty, appropriate emblems of holiday cheer is now almost universal—everyone realizes how much these refined little cards, tags, seals, stickers, etc. add to the value of the Christmas gift. Even though it may be only a little remembrance these bright colored tokens of Joy and Happiness show that loving thought has gone into it and care and pains have been taken with it and this knowledge changes the plainest, most inexpensive present into a gift well nigh priceless.

The ordinary small town stores do not carry these strictly high-grade Christmas novelty packages—they are to be secured only in the large cities and at a high price. So for the benefit of COMFORT readers we had this special assortment made up expressly for us by one of the largest and best known Christmas novelty manufacturers in America. And in order to give the greatest value possible we had them add to the assortment a most beautiful 1917 Christmas Calendar 4½ inches wide by 6½ inches long, lithographed in no less than five colors on heavy white coated specially prepared paper. This Calendar alone is worth all that we ask you to send us for the whole collection—and you will say so too when you see it.

Now let us tell you what this big assortment contains:

One Extra Large Colored and Holly Embossed "Christmas Stocking" Enclosure Card.

Five Large Elegantly Embossed and Colored Christmas Enclosure Cards.

Ten Medium Embossed and Colored Christmas Enclosure Cards.

Two Large Handsomely Colored and Decorated Christmas Tags.

Four Medium colored and Decorated Christmas Tags.

One Extra Large Colored and Holly Embossed Christmas Book Mark.

One Beautiful Extra Large Colored and Embossed Christmas Novelty Cut-out Card.

Two Dainty Colored and Embossed Novelty Cut-out Christmas Folders.

Ten Beautifully Colored and Embossed Santa Claus, Evergreen, Poinsettia, and Christmas Bells Gummed Seals.

One Special Large Oval Illustrated Gold Embossed and Colored Christmas Gummed Seal with the words "Do Not Open Until Chistmas."

Five Novelty Santa Claus Cut-out Christmas Gummed Seals, Embossed in colors.

Ten Cute Novelty Children Cut-out Christmas Gummed Seals.

One Artistic, Beautifully Embossed and Finished Christmas Calendar for 1917.

All the Enclosure Cards, Tags, and Folders carry a Cheery Christmas Greeting such as "Merry Christmas," "With Best Christmas Wishes," "Christmas Greetings," "Merry Yuletide," "Christmas Joys" and others equally as pleasing and appropriate. These are to be tied to or enclosed inside your Christmas packages to bear a loving message with the gift. And all the gaily colored gummed Stamps and Seals you will use to seal and decorate the outside of your Christmas letters and packages as well. You will be surprised and delighted to see how much they add to the attractiveness of your gifts to say nothing of the fun in "doing them up."

And don't forget that in addition to all of these lovely cards, seals, tags, stickers, etc., we are also going to send an exquisitely embossed and multi-colored Christmas Calendar for 1917, a large handsome Holly decorated Book Mark and two large Christmas Novelty Cut-out Folders which are as unique as they are pleasing. When you first look at one of them it is to all appearances a handsome Christmas Post Card and the other a very attractive four page Booklet, when Presto—a flip of the finger, and a startling transformation takes place, causing the figures and designs to stand out in bold relief, and in a life-like manner that is truly wonderful. These cute novelties are something entirely new this season and they make very attractive center-table or mantlepiece ornaments as they are large and stand without support.

This splendid collection will furnish your whole family with all the Holiday Gift Decorations needed for this Christmas and they will surely add to the pleasure of your giving and the gifts themselves will be all the more appreciated by the recipients. We purchased a large quantity of these Novelty Packages but even at that we fear we have not enough to go around so take no chances of being disappointed but send in your order at once. Also Christmas will be here almost before you are aware of it, and you want to make sure of receiving your package in time so that you can get your Christmas packages all ready before Christmas Day.

We will send you this package of beautiful Christmas Novelties including the large Handsome Christmas Calendar for 1917 upon the terms of either one of the following very liberal offers:

Manners and Looks

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Miss K., Meridian, Miss.—Outside of the South, married women when called by their first names have neither Miss nor Mrs. prefixed, but growing out of an old slave custom Southern married women are to this day spoken of as Miss Mary, or Miss whatever the first name is. This prevails not only among their colored, but their white acquaintances as well. If it is heard at all in the North, it is among Southern people.

Inquisitive, Animas, N. M.—The lady establishes the gait at which she walks with a gentleman. Sometimes it is fast, sometimes slow, depending upon what she thinks of the gentleman. (2) If a gentleman has no better judgment than to lead a lady past an ice-cream parlor, she need not have any better manners than to give hm a strong hint to take her in. (3) Custom makes it proper for a gentleman, who has brought a lady home, to stand at the front gate and talk as long as she will let him. The custom has prevailed ever since there were front gates.

Girl of the West, Playas, N. M.—It will be quite proper for you to dance with the soldiers who attend the ball. Our soldiers on the border are very nice soldiers, but it is contrary to military regulations for them to flirt with the girls, so beware. You are quite right when you say: "I think a gentleman is a gentleman, no matter if he is in the army."

Texas Girl, Alvin, Texas.—For a gentleman to attempt to put his arm around a lady while driving with her is so much buggy-riding etiquette, that we think you should accept his apology for the attempt on this occasion which so disastrously failed. But if he tries it again cut his acquaintance.

Perplexed, Lincoln, Texas.—As you are twenty and she sixteen and you have four years' work before you can marry, why do you want to clutter yourselves up with an engagement which is likely to be broken long before the four years are up? Sixteen-year-old girls don't know anything about what their hearts will be when they are four years older, and twenty-year-old boys know still less. If you can't be "just friends" for four years, you haven't got the stuff in you to last through a lifetime of sunshine and shadow, with plenty of shadow. Why do you want to walk with your arm around her, and why kiss her? It means nothing, and what availeth it?

Broken-hearted, Kingston, Tenn.—Etiquette does not prescribe what a gentleman should say when a lady told him to go to the devil, but we can suggest that he might say "Good Night," or that he was near enough already. There is more persiflage, not to say, repartee, in this latter reply. You may take your choice. As to whether she still cares for you because she sends her brother to know where you are and if you are alone, we should say it looked as though she meant for her brother to do you some bodily harm. We solemnly advise you to shunt that lady onto the siding and change to a different style.

A. B. C., Frankfort, Ky.—A lady should thank a gentleman for any courtesy whatever that he extends and she should not ask anybody what words to use in her thanks. The occasion should prompt the most appropriate words. If she intends to be grateful, or polite, by book rules, she had better be neither. (2) The lady may do as she pleases about asking a gentleman to call again, but hospitality which is better than etiquette, suggests that she ask him to call again. This is not always necessary, however, after the first call.

Mrs. C. O. H., Greenleaf, Ida.—Etiquette does not specify any rules controlling a stork party—we never heard of one before—but we should say the recipient of the presents appropriate for such an occasion should extend her thanks as she would for any other shower party. If she can thank them all in person at the party, no letters of thanks will be necessary.

Miss B. K., Jennings, Md.—Sitting at a table the gentleman may be either to the right or left of a lady. Usually he sits between two and rights and lefts don't count. At a table for two only, the gentleman and lady face each other.

M. K., Walla Walla, Wash.—You are a minor and will be for a year yet, or until you are twenty-one—if twenty-one is legal age in your state—and as long as you are a minor your parents control. After that you are free to do as you please. As you are making your own living, entirely independent of your parents, we would suggest that you remain at home until the law sets you free. Then you may go and you may marry if you want to. About that we would advise you not to be in too great a hurry. You are independent of any man's support and unless you are very much in love with a very excellent man fully capable of giving you a good home, marriage may not be all that you think it is. Some homes and husbands are worth a girl's independence and some are not. Being wise today is preferable to being sorry tomorrow.

Uncertain, Plainsville, Ill.—Don't bother your mind about the gentleman who was all attention to you until another man appeared on the scene, and then went off and sulked like a sore schoolboy and would not talk to you or see you again. He lacks both good sense and good manners and the fewer such men you know the happier you will be. Jealousy of that sort is worse than drunkenness, because the drunken man is not always drunk, but the jealous man is always jealous.

G. B., Gibbon, Nebr.—Be friendly with the gentleman, but nothing more, as it will be of no advantage to have his ill will. He is not bad, only stupid and you will find if you are more than formally friendly, that as soon as the other girl has gone away to her school, he will be coming back to you as second choice. If he were not stupid he would know better than to imagine you were as stupid as he is. He may be, as you say, a very nice man in his way, but he has got into a very reprehensible way.

Two Girls, Helper, Utah.—When we had read into your letter until we came to "He don't care nothing neither one of them," we stopped right there and put the letter into a grammar to soak. We will take it out some day and if it has absorbed any of the grammar we may answer it. But girls, why do you write like that? Are there no schools in Helper where respectable English is taught?

Miss B. S., Hellertown, Pa.—There are so many ways of entertaining a friend that when you ask us only how to entertain a friend, we cannot answer. Is it a lady or a gentleman? Do you want to give a dinner, or a tea, or a reception? Do you want to drive, or ride, or have a pedestrian party? You will have to be more explicit before we can know where to begin.

Blue Eyes, Heath, Nebr.—As you seem to be quite a cheerful lass, we suggest that if the red-headed girl insists upon trying to get your beau from you that you put her on one of your white farm horses and turn him loose on the prairie. (2) If you don't like the divorced man and he annoys you by his attentions, ask your father to take a hand in getting rid of him. (3) Etiqette makes no limit of time when a young man should ask a girl to marry him. It often happens that a day or two acquaintance is long enough and then if the girl hasn't any more sense than the man has she accepts him and they marry. One time in ten thousand they live happily ever after. Two people should know each other at least a year before they marry.

Little Bill, Canton, N. C.—You very properly accepted the invitation of the young man who asked to take you home. If the other one wanted to, he should have asked you first. The joke is on him and you have no apologies to offer. Other girls should be as independent as you are with young men who seem to think the girls are simply standing around waiting for them. If he asks you why you treated him that way, show him this.

Perplexed, Raleigh, N. C.—No wonder you are perplexed. It is enough to perplex any lady for a gentleman to ask her "to marry him three times." Marrying a man once is usually considered ample, but still, if you want to marry this one three times, there is no rule in the etiquette book against it. You may do as you please, and you have our blessing and we wish you much joy.

Anxious, Point Roberts, Wash.—The custom among young and silly folks prevails of exchanging rings, or of one loaning another his or her ring. Of course, it means nothing serious and maybe it has some sentimental reasons for existence, but trouble, greater or less, comes of it so many times that we advise all our young people to keep their rings to themselves, until it is time to offer an engagement ring. Even that is not entirely free from trouble of one kind or another, and wedding rings, the most sacred of all, do not guarantee continued joy.

Edna, Allentown, Pa.—You are wise in wanting to know who this stranger is who is so attentive to you. His education, appearance, manners and business indicate that he is all right, but you should not take other than a friendly interest in him, until you know as much as you can about his history, his people and his habits. But it is not your place to make the inquiries first. It is for him, if he is interested in you, to prove to you that he is worthy. After he has done that, you may inquire further into the evidence he presents and you should, if you think seriously of him. Carelessness in this regard has brought sorrow and shame to many a foolish girl, and you should not follow in their footsteps when you can so easily avoid it. All COMFORT girls and parents of girls make a note of this and trust no plausible stranger's words.

Down-hearted, Crookston, Minn.—As the lady does not care for any other and as she likes you, it may be she is one of those girls who have to be shown. Don't annoy her by persistent love-making, but continue your attentions nicely and faithfully until another man appears whom she likes better than she does you and then as her best friend, give way to the one she wants. That man may never appear and you may get her yet, but don't be over-hopeful and don't be foolish about what cannot be helped. It takes two to make a bargain and the unhappiest attempts to make bargains otherwise are found among married people. Be wise in time.

Blue Eyes, Bainbridge, Ga.—Correspondence between persons who have never met is permissible when they have mutual friends who have arranged the preliminaries, but not otherwise, as a rule. There is too much danger of deceit on the part of one or the other and the innocent, as usual, will be the sufferer.

Physical Development

Proper physical development is of the utmost importance to every boy but it is impossible to prescribe a method that would be suitable for all my readers. The boy with big muscles is not always the healthiest and champions, as a rule, pay dearly for their laurels. Never adopt any regular system of exercising without first being examined by a competent physician. He has spent the biggest part of his life in studying the human body and he knows what's inside of you as certainly as you know what is in your own pocket. Do what he tells you and give ear also to the advice of your parents and teachers. As a general precaution against the danger of strain or overdoing yourself, I would say that no boy of ordinarily active habits, should spend more than twenty minutes each day in special exercises. These might be aimed at overcoming some natural or acquired defect such as round shoulders, knock-knees, ungainly carriage, constipation, flat chest and the like. I assure you that it is possible to remedy any of those undersirable conditions but I am equally emphatic in exhorting you not to undertake it without expert advice.

courag , "that I do not propose to be treated like a child."

Drake, ignoring her, gave his attention to the other man.

"I ought to kill you, you coward! You lived under my roof. You rode my horses. You ate my bread. And you stole my wife! Well, take her! No, I'll keep her myself. But you get out of here, do you get that? And if you ever cross my path, or hers, again, so help me Jehovah, I'll crush you for the reptile you are! Move!"

He lifted one of his huge hands and smote Pierce in the face and laughed when the man did not retaliate. Instead a livid and very inglorious "Beau Brummel," he left Julia to her marital reckoning.

Drake turned to her with a sneer on his white lips. "And now I will settle with you," he said.

She neither lifted her head nor answered.

"What you need is a master." His roving eyes fell on a branding iron which he had meant to take to Jenkins earlier in the evening. Seizing it, he thrust it into the coals.

He caught her roughly, his anger past control. "My money bought you, didn't it? If one of my horses played the devil with me as you have done, I'd kill him. But I am not going to kill you. I am going to master you. My cattle bear my brand to warn thieves away, and before God, so shall you!"

She sobbed and struggled but he was inexorable. "You may flaunt your white shoulders before men but they shall see that you have an owner—that you belong to Drake, of the Big Four Ranch."

He held her, half-fainting, till he had accomplished his task, then, releasing her, he strode to the door and went down to the street, while Julia, a sorry figure in her barbaric splendor, her shoulder marred by the brand that would mark her for life, lay in a huddled heap on the floor.

doorway; but she did not move out of Huntley's way. As though her feet were rooted to the floor she stood peering through the rose-colored hangings.

Read The Whole Story Now!

WE feel sure that by this time you are intensely interested in this new thrilling serial by Adelaide Stirling and can hardly wait for your next issue of COMFORT in order to follow the further adventures of Jocelyn or "Jane", the friendless, nameless girl who is battling with powerful enemies and spiteful rivals in her attempt to find some trace of her kindred and solve the mystery of her birth, lineage and her name. All through this story is also woven the thread of a beautiful romance in which true love and devotion are in desperate conflict with spite and malice. This great serial will run in COMFORT through the coming year but if you prefer to read the whole story now, we have arranged to make you a present of the book complete, nicely printed, paper bound and with title page handsomely illustrated in colors. Send us only one, one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25c or your own subscription, renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25c and 5c additional (30c in all) and we will send you the complete story of "Love and Spite" in book form, free and postpaid.

FINDS A MOUND TEMPLE.—The most striking prehistoric ruin yet unearthed by archeologists in America has been found by Dr. J. Walter Fewkes of the Smithsonian Institute, who made his report to the Interior Department. The mound, the largest of any thus far located, was in Mesa Verde National Park in New Mexico. It has been named Sun Temple. There are 25 rooms, and the walls, which total more than 1000 feet in length average four feet thick. The mound was apparently built about 1300 A. D.

Whose Little Girl Wants ME? I Am The Cutest, Sweetest Baby Doll in Toyland and You Can Have Me FREE!

Look At Me!

I Go to Sleep Like a Real Baby

My Legs Are Jointed

YES, this beautiful, curly-haired doll is free to any little girl and on such liberal terms that we expect to give away thousands of them during the next few months. Don't think she is anywhere near as small as she looks to be in the picture for she stands over a foot tall. She has a real kid body and her beautiful head is almost indestructible because it is made of bisque. You can make her stand up or sit down in a chair, or bend over or assume all sorts of natural positions. When you lay her down she closes her eyes and goes to sleep and when you pick her up she is wide awake again. Her beautiful hair hangs in luxuriant curls, her eyes are blue as the sky, and taken altogether she is certainly the cutest and sweetest baby doll in all toyland. With exception of her handsome black openwork lace stockings and cunning little slippers with bow and buckle she comes to you undressed so that you can make your own dresses for her and dress and undress her to your heart's content. Fathers and Mothers—just look at this beautiful doll in the picture as she stands smiling with arms outstretched waiting for someone to pick her up, hug her, kiss her and put on her gay little dress! Don't you think your own little girl would love to have her for her own? We will send her to you free packed in a strong box so she cannot possibly get broken if you will accept the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this handsome Doll exactly as described by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 466.

Make The Children Happy With A Set Of These New Dressing Dolls

Bobby in his Boy Scout Suit | Beatrice in her Holiday Dress | Betty in her Party Dress | Bobby in his Sunday Best | Beatrice in her Winter Dress | Betty in her Play Dress | Betty in her Visiting Dress | Beatrice in her School Dress | Bobby in his Sailor Suit

The Little Folks Love To Play With These Large, Handsome Life-Like Dolls Which May Be Dressed In So Many Different Beautiful Costumes. Over A Foot Tall, Printed In Gorgeous Colors, Ready To Be Dressed When You Receive Them.

Three Dolls With Nine Dresses And Nine Hats Given To You!

YES—this is the most delightful family of dolls that any little girl or boy ever had to play with. The children enjoy them because they are something entirely new and different from all other dolls. Even the most expensive imported dressed dolls do not begin to furnish the little ones with the amusement and joy to be derived from these dear little boy and girl dressing dolls with their bright happy faces and so many different changes of suits, dresses and hats. In the large cities where all the newest ideas are first put on the sale these large handsomely attired life-like dolls are going into all the rich homes where there are little ones and they are fast taking the place of the more costly and elaborate dolls and other toys, because the children never tire of them. These dolls are of course not the small so-called "cut out" paper dolls but are actually 14 inches in height, printed in the most beautiful life-like colors on thick heavy cardboard and so made that they will stand upright in almost any position you wish to place them. But the best part of all is that you can dress and undress them as often as you wish. We not only give you the dolls but all the extra different, beautiful suits, dresses and hats that go with them. Each doll has three different suits or dresses and three different hats and there are three dolls and nine different dresses and hats in all.

Brother Bobby the little boy doll has a handsome Kakhi "Boy Scout" suit with shoes, leggings, coat, hat, haversack and staff complete; a real sure-enough white sailor suit including boatswain's whistle, and a real swell Sunday-go-to-meeting suit, consisting of a black and white check top coat, nobby hat, tan gloves, stockings and white top shoes.

Sister Beatrice is a handsome little girl with golden curls and has a most sumptuous wardrobe consisting of a pretty checked holiday dress, a saucy little hat with feather, white socks and slippers, a school dress with striped Tam-o'shanta, school bag and lunch box and a very expensive winter costume including a handsome set of furs, muff, fur-trimmed hat, leggings and gloves.

Cousin Betty is exactly as pretty as Beatrice only she is a handsome brunette whereas Beatrice is a blonde. Betty is not to be outdone in the matter of clothes either. She is always ready for a romp with a sensible play dress cut in the latest style with hat to match and carrying a large dressed doll in her arms. Then she has a visiting dress with hat, etc., as shown in illustration and a perfect dream of a party dress. And of course when undressed each of these little girl dolls has her own dainty lace and ribbon trimmed underwear while Bobby is every inch a boy in his cool "B. V. D's"

These Dolls Will Cost You No Money!

We will send you all three dolls with nine dresses and nine hats or if you prefer one doll with three dresses and three hats free and prepaid in return for a small favor. Send us only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or one three-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents and we will send you all three dolls with their nine dresses and nine hats by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7842.

Or, for your own renewal for two years at thirty cents and twenty cents extra (50 cents in all), we will send you all three dolls with nine dresses and nine hats by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7842.

Or, we will send you one doll with three dresses and three hats for one one-year subscription (not your own) at 25 cents, or for your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all). Premium No. 7911. It will not be necessary for you to write a letter—just fill out the coupon printed at the right and return it to us with the subscriptions and money. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

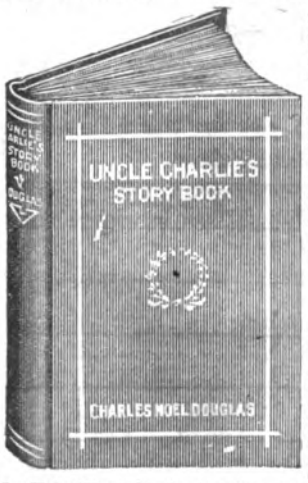
Pair Of Turkish Towels

Premium No. 7302

For Two Subscriptions



AFTER bathing there is nothing quite as fine as a good rub down with a Turkish towel, in fact it is the best towel for all purposes, whether for the bath- or guestroom or for everyday family use in the lavatory, kitchen or pantry. They absorb the water much more readily than other towels and the thick, heavy fleece-like surface imparts to the body a delightful feeling of warmth and well-being, exhilarating the whole system and literally making one fee like "jumping over a high board fence" These towels are also great for baby's toilet as they will not hurt the tender skin. The towels we offer here are genuine Turkish towels—not the imitation kind—and are 17 inches wide and 36 inches long which is a good convenient size for all-round family use. They are of good weight, well made and finished and are in every respect equal to towels that you would willingly pay $1.00 a pair for in any store. We will make you a present of one pair of these fine Turkish towels upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one three-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you one pair (2) of these towels free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 7302.

to this part of your letter, Billy the Goat began to hum:

"Oh the baggage coach ahead,
It is time that it was dead,
For the whiskers long ago round it collected,
In the grave it should be placed,
From memory be effaced,
And never, never more be resurrected."

We look at scenery my dear, and we admire beautiful scenes, but there is no such word in the English language as "sceneries."

1412 Morgantown Ave., FAIRMONT, W. VA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

May I sit by you and gab for a few minutes. I am an Irish dowdy and don't know very much, but am going to try to say a few things about Fairmont. Fairmont is a most wonderful city. John Barleycorn lives hard, but he lives all the same.

Our law makers got the wrong stanza of the law, and the result is instead of ridding the state of whiskey we are getting more in the state. Fairmont is the capital of Marion Co., W. Va., and is on the head waters of navigation of the Monongahela river. Has two railroads, several banks, a number of different churches, stores by the score, schools and high schools, and the state normal school is situated at Fairmont. Several factories, street car lines, and general prosperity abound. The country around Fairmont is very hilly; some good land and some not so good. Farmers generally are prosperous.

I am somewhere between twenty and fifty, five feet nine inches in height, weigh one hundred and sixty-five pounds, dark hair, brown eyes and if the goat don't get this, I would like to hear from some of the cousins.

S. T. WILSON.

Sam, there is just one thing in your letter that has caught me, and that is your reference to general prosperity. I've constantly heard of the general, but I never have had the pleasure of meeting him. I have been on his trail for years but I have never caught up with the old gent yet. When it comes to general prosperity I am from Missouri and have to be shown. If I were to hit the high spots for Fairmont, W. Va., and try to get a glimpse of general prosperity, I know what would happen, I should be informed that the general had just departed for fresh fields and pastures new; then I should have to hike home sad and disconsolate as usual. I often wonder when general prosperity does make his appearance, as some day he will, as the gentleman has the rank of a general, whether the peace-at-any-price cranks will call him a militarist and a jingo. I've got so excited about general prosperity that I've just got to burst into rhyme. Here is the burst.

Oh, General Prosperity, I've often heard of you,
But for umpty million years or more, I've never got a view
Of your bland and smiling countenance with good nature brimming o'er,
Dropping bags of jingling gold from out your plenteous store.
Oh, General Prosperity though long of you I've heard,
And though my anxious bosom too, for years and years you've stirred
With fond anticipation that on me you'd call some day,
Why is it dear old General that you never come my way?

Oh, General Prosperity I've waited for you long,
Waited in the flower of youth, when faith and hope were strong,
Hoping that you'd come and lift, life's heavy load of care,
And lighten just a trifle all the burdens we must bear.
Oft I heard you were approaching and forth I went to greet,
The angel of my golden dreams, but ah, you hoary cheat.
You stood me up in youth time and now I'm old and gray,
You laugh at me derisively and hike the other way.

Oh, General Prosperity, my heart and feet are sore,
For I've tracked you and I've trailed you this whirling globe all o'er.
But I never yet have found you, and it seems to me old pal,
By the way you dodge the common folks, I guess I never shall.
And my search has all been fruitless, and now I know just why
Rockefeller nabbed you as he saw you passing by;
And he swiped your golden chariot leaving not a single spoke,
Now he's a bloated billionaire, while the rest of us are broke.

Oh, General Prosperity if you ever should escape,
From the tyrant hands that hold you, I hope you'll be in shape,
To visit every humble home from Florida to Maine,
And wreathe around this whole wide earth gold links from Plenty's chain.
From poverty and hard times forever set us free,
And mind and keep a two-spot down in your jeans for me.
P. S. If you should drop that two-spot from out your golden cup,
Don't let Rockefeller know it or he's sure to mop it up.

FARMINGTON, GA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I wish to write you a letter of thanks for the nice picture book which you sent me some time ago. I certainly do appreciate it. I am a great admirer of Uncle Charlie. I read your talks every month in COMFORT. I enjoy your witty answers to the cousins' letters. Uncle, you will have to excuse this writing for my father is a poor man and I have never had any schooling much. But I have learned to read, write and spell well. I am sixteen years old. My grandfather reads often of you and he thinks you and Mr. Thomas Watson are great men. Do you read after Mr. Watson? I read his books and papers a great deal and next to Uncle Charlie I think he is the greatest of men. I have read your book of poems and song and later on I want to get your story book. Well, Uncle, I know your are tired of this so I will close. Give my love to Billy and Maria.

Your little friend, NORA SAXON.

Thank you Nora, for your sweet little note. I'm glad you enjoyed the picture book. Very few of our heroes will stand inspection. We dream about them, picture them in our minds, and idealize them. Of course they are always beautiful, charming and delightful, and then when we see a picture of them, we have to touch the push button for the steward to bring us a basin, and that's where we lose a good dinner, supper or breakfast as the case may be. Do you know I never saw anybody who looked just as I had pictured them, just as I hoped they would be, with the exception of Charles Dickens. Oh yes, Tennyson looked all a genius should look and Edwin Markham the poet, has the most spiritual and beautiful face I think I ever saw on a human being. Most of our women writers alas, look like the old scratch. I don't know what a modern photographer could have done for George Eliot or the Bronte sisters, but I know what the old daguerreotype fiends did to them. They made their faces look like rat traps. There was one lady whose work I used to read with delight. She impressed me so that I built in my imagination, a little island in the Pacific, where the fronded palms wave their cocoa-nuts in the tropic breezes and here she and I dreamed our lives away in the ecstatic bliss of a perfect love. One day my dream maiden miraculously drifted to my side. She sent up her card. She was ushered into the waiting room by the Goat while I tore seven million white hairs out of my mustache, scraped my face an inch deep with a safety razor which made my countenance resemble a hamburg steak and left me sitting in a pool of blood three feet deep. I kept frantically inquiring of Maria and Billy how the lady looked, but not a word could I get out of them. Finally when I thought I looked too captivatingly beautiful for anything, and with my heart palpitating like the business end of a Ford Tin Lizzie, I asked them to usher her in. They were a long time ushering her in as she would insist on falling to pieces by the way. With the assistance of a little glue and a few tacks, the Goat and Maria finally deposited her in an armchair by my bedside. As she came in the door I went out of the window. Of course I didn't walk, I just naturally drifted. You see it was leap year and that was my cue to leap. Now when I think of a beautiful authoress, poetess or paintress, I picture her as a mummy with the mumps, and usually I'm not far wrong, for genius and beauty seldom go hand in hand, except of course in the case of your Uncle Charlie, and his pulchritudinous and beautiful family. Nora it grieves me to know that your education has been neglected. If I could get hold of the law-makers of your state and put them across my knees, believe me, they would have no teeth when I got through. It is a crime and a shame that a wealthy state like Georgia cannot keep its children in school until they are fourteen at least. If I had my way it would be sixteen or twenty-one. If Georgia was as anxious to hold the educational record as it is the lynching record it would be more to its credit. Let some poor child in Georgia be killed and somebody will be lynched before morning. Put ten thousand little children in the mills and grind their little bodies to dust between the upper and nether millstones of profit and exploitation and you won't hear a word. Oh, yes, you will hear a word, you will hear the Legislature saying that it must not make laws forbidding children to work in factories, or capital, dear lovely capital, will be driven to other states. Well, after all, these people would not be making laws, if the voters did not elect them, so getting down to brass tacks it is the people who need spanking as well as the lawmakers. Fortunately they have got a law through Congress that will put the kibosh on most of this child exploitation. I'll tell you more about that some other time. Now I'll get a ton of letters telling me I am an old Yankee criticizing Southern institutions, and that life in a Southern mill has heavenly bliss walloped a million times over. Save your breath my dear friends, to cool your porridge. I am not a Yankee, so your arrows will go wide of the mark. I know conditions in New England mills are often as bad and at times worse than they are in Southern mills. But two wrongs do not make a right, and if my friend Tom Watson would let up on Jews, socialists and others for a while and turn his guns on child exploitation, and help me to look after some of the hundreds of invalids in the Southeastern States, who constantly appeal to me for help—whole families destitude even for clothing—he would go up a whole heap in my estimation. Nora, you say you have learned to read, write and spell well. I'm tickled to bits to hear it my dear, as I know lots of people who spell it w-e-l and w-e-l-l-e. I hope however you have learned to spell more than well, and from the look of your letter I imagine you have. Give my love to your grandfather. Anyone who is interested in literature is a brother of mine. I can talk and reason with a man who reads, that is if he reads widely and understandingly, and not lopsidedly and narrowly. People who read one paper and absorb the ideas of one man and take all his dope for Gospel truth give me a pain. This remark is intended not only for those who get all their progressive ideas from Kansas, but to those who sit down with the Bible and misinterpret nearly every verse they read, thanks to a too literal interpretation of various passages of Scripture. Nora you ask me if I read after Mr. Watson, I think I do, because he like most sensible, healthy people I imagine, quits reading at eleven o'clock and goes to bed, while I often am reading long after midnight, so I guess I can safely say I read after Mr. Watson. I am interested a great deal more in national than in state matters. I would like to abolish ninety per cent of all the countries and fifty per cent of all the states. State government is so rotten and graft is so rampant and the expense of county and state management is so great that for the next twenty-five years at least I would like to see a strong centralized government, one that would wipe out murderers grafters, drunks and the lawless generally. Liberty here has degenerated into license. What we need is the strong, iron hand of a central authority to bring criminals to justice and spies and traitors to the detention camp, and BOTTLE FLOATED 16 YEARS.—After floating about in the Pacific Ocean for years, a bottle containing a note probably written and thrown overboard by one of the officers of the schooner Transit, has been found on the beach by an Indian, Bob Wayne, near Moclips, Hoquiam, Wash. The note was dated Aug. 10, 1899, and was perfectly legible, though the writing and the paper were considerably faded. The message contained a report of doings on board the ship.

FLIES 2,200 MILES.—"Ben Bolt," a carrier pigeon, has established a new long distance flight of 2,200 miles from Norwalk, Ohio, to Los Angeles, Cal. It made the trip in five days, nine hours and 31 minutes. The best previous flight was made in 1912 by a bird which covered 1,000 miles.

Comfort's Bedtime Stories For Little Folks!

A Library of Cute Little Books

12 WONDERFUL TALES IN STORY AND VERSE 12

Premium No. 7951

Entire Library Sent For One Subscription!

The stories of our childhood—how well we remember them. After all it seems but a short time since we listened with rapt attention to the adventures of Robinson Crusoe cast away on his lonely island—of beautiful Cinderella, the fairy and the prince—the tragic fate of poor little Red Riding Hood—these were only a few of the marvelous tales that thrilled our childish imagination and helped us spend many blissful hours.

The children of today are the same as they were fifty years ago. And these good old-time stories are just as popular with the young folks now as they were then. So we have decided to give our little boy and girl friends this fine big collection of stories which includes some of the old-time favorites as well as a number of newer and later books equally as interesting. There are twelve of them in all as follows:

Robinson Crusoe, Little Red Riding Hood, Cinderella, Mother Goose, Animal Pets, Purring Pussies, Playmates, Our Pets, The Three Bears, The Sleeping Beauty, Playful Pets, The Teddy Bears.

As these stories are intended for the younger children some of them have been "boiled down" to the fewest and simplest words so that they are not as complete as the original editions, but all of them are printed on fine paper in large clear type that is easy to see and read and have no less than five beautiful full page illustrations in colors.

The first four titles named above of course need no introduction. The other eight titles are just the sort of stories that delight every child—stories of animal pets, horses, donkeys, dogs, bunnies, pussy cats, chickens, lambs, etc., wonderful romances in which there are old Stone Castles, Kings, Queens, Princes, Princesses, Good Fairies, and Wicked Fairies, stories of the Bear Family—Pa Bear, old Ma Bear and little "Teddy" Bear, stories of little Playmates, the true tale of the Teddy Bears—in fact the finest collection of juvenile short stories ever published. Each book is nicely bound with a handsomely illustrated cover in colors and is 4 inches by 5¼ inches in size.

There is nothing you could get for the children that would make them any happier than this fine story collection and best of all it will cost you Nothing as we are giving it away as a premium. We will send you free the entire collection of twelve stories, each story in a book by itself—twelve different books in all—if you will accept either one of the following special offers:

Offer No. 7951 A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you this entire library of twelve books by parcel post prepaid.

Offer No. 7951 B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all) we will send you all twelve books by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7951.

the whole country to a realizing sense of the duty it owes to civilization and the world at large. We have too many rascally officials, thousands of crooked politicians who constantly need watching. The whole bunch should be set to gun and road making and ditch digging, then we'd have fewer thieves to watch and better government. Billy and Maria send you their best love and so does Uncle Charlie.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a 15-month subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Would You Accept This Car As A Gift?

We Are Going To Make A Present Of It To Sombody And Give Away

Thousands Of Dollars In Cash Prizes Besides!

CASH PRIZES every month, more and larger Cash Prizes at the close of the Contest, and on top of all, this beautiful, powerful, 1917 Five-Passenger Overland Touring Car—aren't these splendid rewards just for going out once in a while—when you find the time—and getting a few subscriptions for COMFORT?

And to think that you won't have to make any more effort to win them than if you were getting up clubs for some of the premiums in our Premium List or in the regular issues of COMFORT. You simply send in your clubs the same as usual for any of COMFORT'S premiums, at the same time telling us that you want to enter the Contest, and we place these very same clubs to your credit on the Automobile and Cash Prizes. That's all there is to it. It costs you nothing to try and you are just as likely to come out the winner of the Auto or some other prize as the next person.

Stop and think of the satisfaction and pleasure you could get out of this big, splendid Touring Car—what it would mean to your family and your friends. Think of the comforts of life you could buy with some of this prize money. Then get started at once! Remember—the contest has just opened so everybody who enters now is sure to gain a big lead over those who come in later. Read this announcement carefully—all of it—then get busy with the subscription blank below. It will hold the names of six subscribers and a club of six will help you to win one of the Monthly Cash Prizes in addition to your premiums and at the same time give you a big start toward winning the $635 Auto or one of the Grand Cash Prizes.

How The Auto And Other Prizes Will Be Awarded!

This contest is open to all except our own employes, news agents or dealers and professional subscription solicitors. The 108 Monthly Cash Prizes, will be awarded every month as explained further on. The 62 Grand Prizes, a list of which is given below, will be given in their order to the sixty-two contestants who send in the most subscriptions up to and including April 30, 1917. The $635 Overland Car will go to the one who sends in the largest number of subscriptions. The $200 in Cash will go to the one who sends in the second largest number. The $150 in cash will go to the one who sends in the third largest number, and so on. Following is a list of the Grand Prizes.

First Grand Prize $635 Five-Passenger Overland Touring Car
Second Grand Prize $200 Cash
Third Grand Prize $150 Cash
Fourth Grand Prize $100 Cash
Fifth Grand Prize $75 Cash
Sixth Grand Prize $50 Cash
Seventh Grand Prize $25 Cash
Next Ten Grand Prizes, each $15 Cash
Next Fifteen Grand Prizes, each $10 Cash
Next Thirty Grand Prizes, each $5 Cash

The Monthly Cash Prizes ranging from $180 to $200 a list of which follows, will be awarded and paid each and every month—from November 1916 to April 1917 inclusive. They will be given to the contestants who send in the most subscriptions during each month. So you see this gives you the opportunity to win six separate and distinct Monthly Cash Prizes, besides one Grand Prize—either the Auto or a Grand Cash Prize. Also notice that beginning with December the Monthly Prizes double and with January they thribble, thus giving you the opportunity to win twice and three times the amount of the original prize. In other words if you win a Monthly Cash Prize one month we pay you at once. If you win any Monthly Cash Prize the next month we will pay you double the amount of your second month's prize, and we will continue to pay double each successive month that you continue to win any Monthly Cash Prize. Doubling begins with December.

If you win the same Monthly Cash Prize three months in succession we will pay you double the amount of the prize the second month and thribble the amount the third month, and we will continue to pay you thribble the amount each successive month that you continue to win the same Monthly Cash Prize. If, however, you should win the First Monthly Cash Prize each month for the whole six months then we will pay you four times the amount of that prize the fourth month, five times the amount the fifth month, and six times the amount the sixth month. Thribbling begins with January. Following is a list of the Monthly Cash Prizes.

NOVEMBER
First Prize	$30	Next 3 Prizes	$5 each
Second Prize	20	Next 4 Prizes	3 each
Third Prize	10	Next 8 Prizes	2 each
DECEMBER
First Prize	$30 or $60	Next 3 Prizes	$5 or $10 each
Second Prize	20 or 40	Next 4 Prizes	3 or 6 each
Third Prize	10 or 20	Next 8 Prizes	2 or 4 each
JANUARY
First Prize	$30 to $90	Next 3 Prizes	$5 to $15 each
Second Prize	20 to 60	Next 4 Prizes	3 to 9 each
Third Prize	10 to 30	Next 8 Prizes	2 to 6 each

The Cash Prizes for February, March and April are the same as those for January with the exception that the First Prize is $30 to $120 for February, $30 to $150 for March and $30 to $180 for April.

You Get Your Premiums Anyway!

Nobody loses in this contest. We are going to reward every contestant for every single subscription secured—either with premiums or a cash commission. Every club you send in will entitle you to a fine premium which you may select from our regular Premium List or any issue of COMFORT. And that very same club will be placed to your credit on the monthly Cash Prizes and the Auto and other Grand Prizes. Your premiums will be sent to you promptly upon receipt of your clubs, or, if you prefer the cash commission, deduct and retain 40 per cent. of the subscription money collected and remit us the balance. In this way we liberally reward you for all of your subscriptions as fast as you secure them. The premiums or commission alone more than pay you for your trouble and you still have the opportunity to become the owner of the splendid $635 Overland Touring Car or one of the other Grand Prizes to be awarded, at the close of the contest, April 30, 1917.

Contest Just Started—Enter Now!

NOW is the time to act! You are sure of a fine premium anyway, and you may start a Monthly Cash Prize your way also by mailing us the subscription blank printed below along with two or more subscriptions to COMFORT. We will send your premiums as fast as you send in your clubs. Or in place of premiums you may deduct your cash commission. Remember that in entering this contest you place yourself under no obligations whatever and you forfeit nothing if you stop at any time. In other words the subscriptions sent in by you will still remain to your credit on the Monthly Cash Prizes and Grand Prizes. So you see you have everything to gain and nothing to lose. You cannot possibly lose because you get your premiums or cash commission anyway. Start a club today. Get all of your friends and acquaintances to subscribe or renew their subscriptions to COMFORT. They will be glad to help you out. Then mail us your first club as soon as possible, and have your name entered in this grand contest for the $635 Overland Touring Car and other Prizes.

Children's Happy Hour

Violet's Magic Curls

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

ONCE Violet's brown hair was as curly as the tendrils of a climbing vine, but sickness came and laid her low for many days, and, when she finally got better, her pretty ringlets were faded and dead and had to be cut off. Folks told her they would grow out nicer than ever in a short time, but—what do you think? When her hair did come back, it was as straight as grass and just wouldn't stay curled more than one day. This made her sad and she sought everywhere for a charm that would restore her much prized curls. For a long time her efforts were in vain but one day, while romping in the field, she saw a pony weeping and gently asked him what the trouble was.

"I'm crying because my mane and tail have grown so curly that they catch all the thistles along the path," he answered.

Violet was deeply interested.

"Were they always that way?" she inquired.

"Oh, no, only since last night," was the surprising reply.

"And do you know what caused it?"

"Of course I do; it was bathing in the magic spring. The day was warm and I had run a long distance, so when I came to the pool formed by the bubbling water, I waded in and rolled myself on the sandy bottom and right away my straight hair became fluffy and kinky like you see it now."

"It must have been the sand that worked the charm?" she said.

"It was," he whinnied, "for I bathed there many times before but never, until yesterday, did I roll on the bottom."

"Please tell me where it is?" she cried eagerly.

"It is two miles along this lane but you must turn whenever you meet a wild cherry tree."

"Will you take me there?"

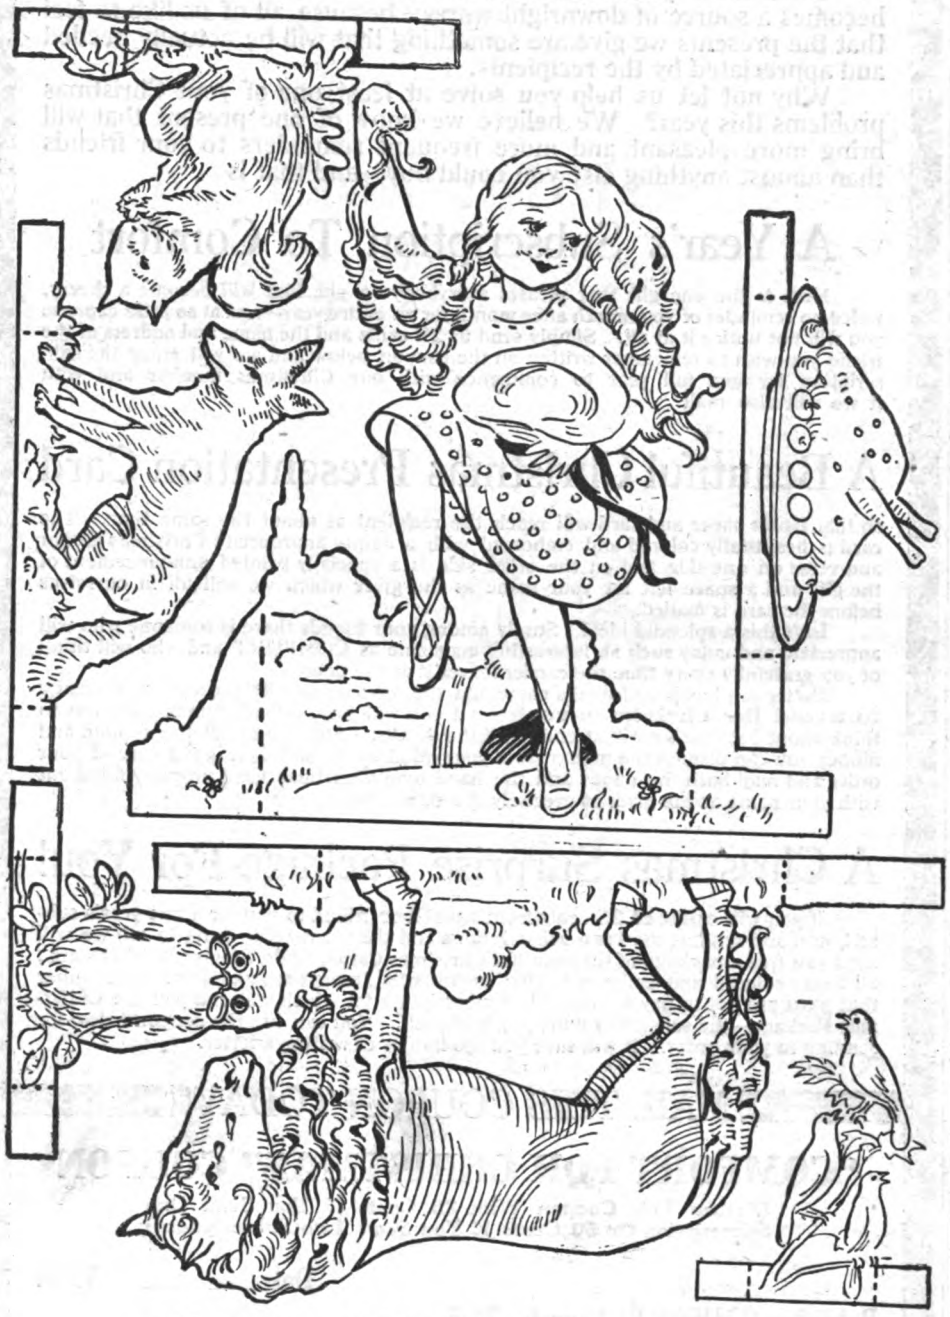
"Tell me first what your purpose is?"

"I wish to get some of the magic sand to make my hair curly."

This was too much for the pony. He could not understand why she should want her hair put into a shape that would catch burrs and thistles, so with a loud snort, he galloped off and was soon lost to sight. Violet was so vexed that tears came to her eyes, but she started off, determined to find the spring if it took all day.

"I will turn when I come to a wild cherry tree," she mused, but now, she remembered that the pony had not told her in what direction to turn. On and on she walked, keeping a sharp lookout on all sides and presently she came to the tree she sought and saw, sitting under it, a gray fox.

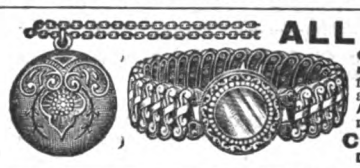
"Please, Mr. Fox," she called, "tell me the way to the magic spring?"



"Go to he left," he said, "until you meet another wild cherry tree, then turn to the right and keep straight ahead until you meet another and so on, first to the right and then to the left."

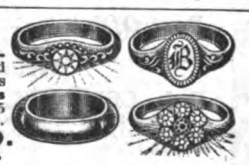
She thanked him and trudged on and after a hard journey through brambles and bushes finally was rewarded by seeing the water bubbling up in the center of a round pool. A squirrel was sitting on the bank eating a nut but she rushed right past him and plunged both hands into the stream, picking up the white sand from the bottom and rubbing it on her hair. Instantly it grew wavy and beautiful. She could see herself on the surface of the water and she sat there a long time, too happy to note that it was growing dark. All of a sudden the sun seemed to go down behind a hill and an owl gave a lonesome hoot.

"Oh, how will I ever get home in the dark?" she cried.



"I will lead you," offered the owl, "for I can see at night. He was a queer companion indeed, but he hopped gallantly in front of her all the way and soon she was safe in her own bed.

The next day was Thanksgiving. She slept late and was wakened by some birds tapping at her window. It did not take her long to dress but at first her folks did not know her and she had to tell them the story of the magic sand and show them a handful she had brought with her. Then they knew it was their own dear Violet. When they sat down to eat turkey and all the good things that made up their Thanksgiving dinner, she felt that she had a great deal to be thankful for.



Cut-Out Doll Directions

Paste the entire picture on a piece of cardboard (using boiled flour paste) and smooth, with the hands, from the center towards the edges. Put it in a large book to dry and let it remain there at least three hours. Cut out each dress and hat with scissors and color them with crayons, chalk or water colors. The different objects illustrate the story and may be arranged in various ways. Each of them can be made to stand alone in an upright position by bending back the base strips at the dotted lines to form angles or corners. Keep the set in an envelope and when your mamma reads the story you can arrange the dolly girl and the other figures to suit yourself.

Look at the Millions Rats Cost

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

IT has recently been estimated by a French statistician that $1,000,000 worth of food a day is wasted on rats in Great Britain alone.

In other countries the expense runs equally high, and even higher. Every rat in France costs two cents a day for his keep.

In England a rat costs from one half a cent to five cents a day to the person upon whose property it preys, and there are 40,000,000 rats in the British Isles.

In our country there are more rats than men, women and children, and doubtless their appetite is just as expensive here.

In India however, a country least able to bear the burden of supporting these pests, they are four times as numerous as the population, and each rat consumes on an average three cents' worth of food a day.

Some time ago there was an international union organized in France to rid the world of these unwelcome creatures.

The rat commits another sin besides impoverishing the country. He carries disease, and it is probable, because he is dangerous to health rather than because he is a thief, that he will be finally exterminated.

There is a race war going on between rats themselves which will help solve the problem. The black rat is being driven out by the gray rat. The black rat is a much greater nuisance than the gray rat. All along the Atlantic coast he has been driven out, and only the gray rat now is found.

Perhaps if they keep up their war long enough they may exterminate each other.

Free To Every Little Girl!

Golden Locks And Her Lovely Twin Babies!

All Three Dollies Given To You Without Cost!

Premium No. 463.

Mothers, Don't Fail To Read This Offer!

COMFORT wants to give free to your little girl and every little girl this handsome doll Family stamped in beautiful colors on strong cloth with full directions so that you can cut them out, stuff and sew them up in less than ten minutes. "Golden Locks" is almost as big as a real baby, for she stands one and one half feet high and her cute little twin babies which you see in the picture stand over half a foot high. These dolls cannot be broken no matter how much they are thrown around or dropped on the floor and you can make them bend their arms and legs, stand up and sit down in a chair and assume all sorts of natural positions. They have beautiful golden hair which hangs in the dearest curls you ever saw and fastened with a bright red ribbon bow that cannot get lost or become untied, handsome red cheeks, rosy lips and lovely blue eyes which smile at you in such a lifelike way that you would almost think they were ready to speak and say "Mama." As shown in above illustration they are dressed in dainty lace-trimmed underwear with bright red stockings and black buttoned boots. The three dolls together—"Golden Locks" and the two sweet Baby Dolls—make the cutest and prettiest Doll Family any little girl ever had to play with. They are lots better for the little folks than the more expensive bisque and china dolls because they will not break or snarl their pretty hair or lose their eyes. There is no little girl who will not instantly fall in love with this beautiful Doll Family and spend many happy hours with it, so we hope that every mother who reads this offer will take advantage of it at once. We will send you all three dolls free by Parcel Post prepaid on the terms of the following special offers.

Offer 463 A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you all three dolls free by parcel post prepaid.

Offer No. 463 B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all) we will send you all three dolls free by Parcel Post prepaid. (Premium No. 463). Address COMFORT. Augusta, Maine.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Mrs. J. W. H., Hamilton, Oregon.—There is no remedy for the excessive rocking of your mother in her rocking-chair when she becomes nervous, that we can prescribe from this distance, except to put her in a chair which has no rockers on it. We hardly think the rocking will affect her brain. Why not let her rock as much as she likes; probably it relieves the nervous strain, and if you stop her it may do harm.

Worried, Macksburg, Iowa.—Most of the pains of the body manifesting themselves as yours do are rheumatic, or neuralgic, and are not internal, but some of them are, and when any trouble of that kind will not yield to external applications nothing can be done except to have a physician make an examination and determine what the cause is. After that, treatment is plain and sometimes it may be successful and sometimes not. Don't guess any longer at what the matter is, but see a physician and be examined properly.

Brown Eyes, Poole, Nebr.—There is more danger in the water itself than in the iron pipes through which it is received. Iron pipes are used almost entirely for conveying water and there is no harm unless the water is impure. Examine the water, not the pipes. (2) We cannot understand why you did not have a physician when your child was born, but now that the harm has been done, we advise you to have one and perhaps he can cure now what he could have prevented then.

Mrs. M. E., Burnleys, Va.—Consumption cannot be cured by merely using eggs, though eggs are excellent as part of a consumptive's diet. No medicine has been discovered that will cure consumption, but taken in time, nourishing diet with fresh air, night and day, and a dry climate may effect a cure, and in any case may prolong life.

Mrs. B. P., Newtonia, Mo.—We think the difficulty with your husband is catarrhal, affecting his throat and ears. As his ears are affected with what seems to be boils, there is nothing to be done, except after examination by a physician. Of course, the specialist whom you consulted did not know as much as you did about it, though he had spent years of study and practise, and you would not listen to his advice, or take his treatment. Still, it would have been better than your guessing at it, or asking us to guess. Go to a physician.

Mrs. F. H., Princess Anne, Md.—In old persons cramps and cold feet and limbs are not unusual because the circulation is on the ebb and youth cannot be put into the blood again by the best doctors. Nothing is better to improve the circulation in the limbs than thorough massaging, night and morning, and at intervals through the day. Rub with the hands, down a while, then up, beginning at the knees or elbows, legs or arms, or higher if necessary. That is purely mechanical action which will force the blood along to the extremities. Bathing the feet in hot water, hot as can be borne, and finishing with cold, then rubbing with a hard towel will also produce warmth. Most patients will not follow this treatment because it requires too much effort and is too much trouble and they prefer to take medicine of some kind, not because it will do any good, but because it is so much less trouble. Medicine is of no value. Massage and a proper diet with as much exercise as maybe, will produce results if anything will. Proper diet will keep the blood in good condition, and the other will keep it moving on its natural course.

Mrs. L. P., Newfolden, Minn.—If the most eminent physician and surgeon in your state told you that the swelling was goiter and for you to wait until it grew large enough to be operated upon, we should say he was giving you better advice than you could get out of a "doctor book," or even from COMFORT. Men of his class, if he is what you claim for him, do not deceive patients, or give bad advice in order to get fees out of them later. We would advise that you take his advice. (2) There are many remedies, some fine, some cases actually remedial, for constipation and many of them fail as often as they do not. We have found that one of the best remedies is prepared bran to be had at any grocery store and to be taken at meals with other food, or taken three times a day in glass of hot water, say from two to four tablespoonfuls. It is harmless and if taken regularly will begin to act within a week or ten days and will regulate the bowels as none of the usual medical laxatives and purgatives will. There are various brands of it and one is about as effective as another. It is even better cooked in the form of bran rolls which are appetizing. A dose of any laxative salts taken once a week in the morning may be of some assistance to the bran if it does not give sufficient relief. As for diet, eat plenty of fruit, cooked or raw, and more vegetables than meat and take brown bread in preference to white. Old-fashioned black molasses with your brown bread will be found efficacious and it is not bad eating, either.

L. L. T., Long Beach, Cal.—Very many people, especially women, in this country suffer from diseases that they do not have, never had and never will have. It is the result of hysteria, or nerves, or heaven knows what, but it is real enough to make more trouble than if it actually existed, because if it existed, it might be cured, but how can that be cured which does not exist? The physician, who examined you for that blood taste you think you have, was quite right in laughing at you when he found you were normal. Now stop looking at yourself from your own viewpoint and look at yourself from the doctor's and before you know it you will be as normal in mind as you are in body.

J. W., Canon City, Colo.—One part of the human body is as sacred and as necessary as another and when you think the proper care of any part is humiliating and degrading, it is time you were going to the doctor who gave you the advice and begging him to teach you the proper idea of the human body, its organs and their functions. God made man in His image and the proper care of any part of that image is not humiliating and degrading.

Mrs. B. K., Wyoming, Del.—As the tongue may be coated from any one of numerous causes, you will first have to tell us what causes yours before we can suggest what should be done for it. Suppose you go to a doctor and find out what the cause is and while you are at his office, just ask him what to do for it.

Mrs. W. S., Cambridge, Ida.—At a guess we should say your daughter's headaches were what is known as migraine, or megrim, sometimes called megrims. This usually first manifests itself by disordered vision, seeing only half of objects, or by dimness of sight, followed by a peculiar flashing and wavy glimmer. This passes off after an interval of a few minutes, or it may continue for an hour or longer, with little or no pain, but a disagreeable sensation of dullness sometimes extending to the body and limbs, and frequently with nausea. After this comes the headache, often called "sick headache," which may continue for a short or long time according to the severity of the attack. The trouble is quite common, though most people think it is merely one form of headache. Megrim, however, is more than that and is the result of several causes, heredity, being one, anemic condition and lack of tone in the system, nervous disturbance and others. Treatment must be prescribed by a physician who can study the case. It is frequently found among young people who will outgrow it, though it will never leave some. The attacks vary in time of appearance, with some every week, and with others not for months or even years. The intervals between the attacks is the best time for treatment and this treatment must be by a physician thoroughly conversant with the case and realizing that megrim is a disease requiring his careful attention. We say as much as we do about this ailment because so few persons suffering with it know anything at all about it and so many suffer with it and will continue to do so unless they have proper treatment. (2) Goiter can only be treated by a physician who can examine it. The exact cause of goiter is not known, but it may come from strain, or drinking certain kinds of water, not necessarily polluted water, but containing some mineral substance which will produce goiter.

Mrs. E. O., Arlington, Colo.—If your little girl has nothing the matter with her but excessive perspiration about the head at night, thank the good Lord that she is so healthy. There are dozens of worse ailments she might have.

E. H., Norfield, Miss.—Better see a doctor and have him remove the tapeworm, which is easily done. Tapeworms are very undesirable tenants of the human body and will do serious injury if permitted to remain on the premises.

Mrs. T. L., Mt. Auburn, Iowa.—Pains in the heart are often caused from pressure of the gases in the stomach resulting from indigestion, but when they are as severe as yours are and extend to the arm and side, there is something more than indigestion back of them. We cannot guess at what they mean, or are, but you should get the best advice possible from physicians who can examine your condition. To be perfectly frank with you, we think they are dangerous. Still, you should not worry about them, because people who have had dangerous heart trouble have lived longer than others who didn't have any at all.

A. L., Stephen, Minn.—Epilepsy may result from various causes, but oftenest the tendency is inherited. Very little success has attended its treatment, other than temporary relief, and it is held to be incurable. Liver spots, white warts and such are due to defective condition of the blood and they will remain until the blood condition is improved. Ordinary external applications are of no value.

N. P. A., Christopher, Ill.—A change of climate is about the only real relief for catarrh and even that will not always relieve, though it will usually if taken in time. We think that any young person having catarrh, or a catarrhal tendency, is to blame for any future suffering, who will remain in a climate where catarrh prevails. All the treatment you take will be of little benefit so long as you stay where the cause of the trouble is. Go to Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, North Carolina mountains, or anywhere that the air is dry. You ask us what you should do and we tell you to get out of that climate before it is too late.

Street Paved with Gold

In South American cities there is very little paving, but Paramaribo, the capital of Dutch Guiana, boasts of a stretch of roadway, paved with gold bearing quartz. This material was obtainable nearby at a low cost so the engineers decided to use it. It had to be crushed by pounding with hammers and women and children, as well as men, did part of this work. The wages paid to each was small but they were allowed to keep all the gold they found in the rock they were breaking up. This made the onerous labor rather interesting and some of the natives are said to have received a daily stipend that would compare favorably with the amount paid to some of our highest grade American workers. It is the only instance I ever heard of, in which, a prospector had the mine brought to his door instead of being put to the trouble of going out in the desert to seek one.

What Shall I Give Them For Christmas?

HOW MANY TIMES do you ask yourself this question as the holidays draw near and you are making up your list of those whom you wish to remember with some appropriate yet inexpensive Xmas gift?

Oftentimes you find it almost impossible to decide—it even becomes a source of downright worry—because all of us like to feel that the presents we give are something that will be actually needed and appreciated by the recipients.

Why not let us help you solve at least one of your Christmas problems this year? We believe we know of one present that will bring more pleasant and more frequent reminders to your friends than almost anything else you could buy—and that is

A Year's Subscription To Comfort

Here is the one gift that pleases everybody—a gift that will become a cheery, welcome reminder of you month after month for an entire year—and at so little expense you will not notice it at all. Simply send us 25 cents and the name and address of the friend you wish to remember written on the coupon below and we will enter the subscription for one full year to commence with our Christmas number and with it we will also mail

A Beautiful Christmas Presentation Card

so that both paper and card will reach the recipient at about the same time. The card is beautifully colored and embossed with a dainty appropriate Christmas design and verse on one side and on the other side is a specially printed announcement of the gift and a space left for your name as the giver which we will fill in ourselves before the card is mailed.

Isn't this a splendid idea? Surely among your friends there is someone who will appreciate and enjoy such an interesting magazine as COMFORT and who will think of you gratefully every time the carrier leaves it at the door.

Better send us your friend's name and the money now—it's none too early to avoid the Christmas rush—and you will have at least one present less to think about because we will attend to all the details. After you mail the coupon and money you can dismiss the matter from your mind as we will take good care of your order and mail both the paper and the handsome Christmas Card properly filled out with your name as the giver at precisely the right time.

A Christmas Surprise Package For You!

If you will collect 25 cents from another friend to pay for a one year's subscription and send us the two subscriptions and the money (50 cents in all) we will send you free a package of 60 beautiful Christmas Cards, Seals, Stamps, Stickers, etc., all finely colored and embossed, the season's latest novelties. Remember that you are not to pay for this other subscription for which we send you the Christmas Package—the subscriber must pay it himself. You can use the coupon below for sending in your order. It will save you the bother of writing a letter.

4 Wheel Chairs in October

369 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The four October wheel chairs go to the following applicants. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Edward Bryan Law, Sailors Rest, Tenn., 103; Emmett Odell, Saratoga, Texas, 100; Mabel I. Foster, Bentonia, Miss., 99; Alice Scafe, Stillwater, Okla., 85.

It is difficult to imagine more pitiable affliction than appears in the cases of these poor, worthy sufferers as described in the letters I have from their friends, which are enough to wring compassion from the coldest, most selfish heart. Let me tell you briefly of their sad plight, oppressed by poverty, crippled and tortured by disease, and suffering for want of care and lack of the common comforts necessary to make invalid existence endurable.

Poor little Edward Law, age nine years, has never walked and can get about only by crawling on the floor. He has suffered intensely. Surgical operations were performed in three places on each leg last summer and he was in a plaster cast for seven weeks. He is bright mentally and bears his suffering patiently. His good mother obtained all the subscriptions for his chair.

Emmett Odell, aged eleven, has no use of his lower limbs resulting from spinal trouble which began six years ago. He is dependent on his mother and two sisters for support and care. His mother writes that he is getting too heavy for her to handle without a wheel chair.

Mabel I. Foster, age nineteen, is entirely helpless and suffers such pain from rheumatism that she has to be kept under the influence of morphine much of the time. Her parents are poor, having spent all they had and all they could earn for her medical treatment. Her legs are drawn up and stiffened in a sitting position. The mother expects the wheel chair will prove a great help in caring for her. She has been in this condition about eight years.

Alice Scafe, age ten years, is a helpless, hopeless invalid and can neither walk nor talk. Her father is poor and her mother, with five other children to care for, is too busy to attend to Alice whose entire care falls on her thirteen-year-old sister who has to stay from school and tend her like a baby all day long, which she does faithfully and uncomplainingly.

There are many other equally distressing cases among the applicants who are trying for, and are in most urgent need of wheel chairs. My good friends, will you not do something this month to help provide them with wheel chairs to relieve their sufferings and make their lives more endurable? At this Thanksgiving season manifest your gratitude in this way for the many blessings you enjoy.

Twenty subscriptions sent in by E. M. Dykes in aid of Mamie Howell's wheel chair were duly allowed to her, but in the June "Roll of Honor" they were printed as having come from Miss Alice Mullen, therefore I make this correction now.

The month's Roll of Honor and the few letters of thanks for which there is room appear below.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

Little Brother Pushes Him About in His COMFORT Wheel Chair

URBANA, ILL.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

My son Harold received his wheel chair some time ago and is very much pleased with it, so much so that I can hardly keep him at home. His little four-year-old brother pushes him anywhere he wants to go. The truant officer told me she would try to arrange for him to attend school in his wheel chair as it is only a block away. May God bless you and all who have assisted me in getting this chair, and may you live long to carry forward this good work.

Yours respectfully, MRS. OLIVE GROB.

Had a Fine Time Visiting Friends in Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

LAPWAI, IDAHO.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I received the wheel chair for Margaret and am so pleased with it. We took her to Lewiston for a visit and she had a fine time visiting her friends in her chair. I will send you one of her pictures as soon as I get them. With many thanks I am,

Very respectfully, MRS. BENTON DENNY.

Hopes to Enjoy Long Rides in His Wheel Chair

TURTLE, MO.

MR. W. H. GANNETT:

DEAR SIR.—The lovely wheel chair has come and I hope to enjoy long rides in it soon. Many, many thanks for it, and may you live long to send out wheel chairs to lots of other cripples. With a thankful heart I remain, Yours respectfully, GLEN SPARKS.

Well Pleased With Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

LOVELAND, OKLA.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

Mamie has received her wheel chair and she is well pleased with it, for which we thank you very much.

Her papa, D. M. HOWELL.

Comfort's Comicalities "Jest for Fun"

Not Satisfied

One evening a little boy entered a grocery store and handed the clerk a note which read: "I am a poor woman and have no money. My children and I are starving. Won't you give us something to eat?"

The kind-hearted clerk filled a large basket with food and gave it to the boy, who quickly departed.

In a few minutes he again entered the store.

"What's the trouble now?" said the clerk.

"Mamma sent me back to get the trading stamps," the lad replied.—Louisville Evening Post.

Kindness of Heart

His face was pinched and drawn. With faltering footsteps he wended his way among the bustling crowd.

"Kind sir," he suddenly exclaimed, "will you not give me a loaf of bread for my wife and little ones?"

The stranger regarded him not unkindly. "Far be it from me," he rejoined, to take advantage of your destitution. Keep your wife and little ones; I do not want them."—Tid Bits.

Its Vocabulary

"That parrot of theirs! Why, it rattles off all the gossip of the neighborhood!"

"Yes. When it was learning to talk they forgot to take it out of the room the day the sewing society met."—Browning's Magazine.

The Jury Reports

It was the first case ever tried in Stony Gulch, and the jury had sat for hours arguing and disputing. At last they straggled back, and the foreman, a tall mountaineer, expressed the general opinion.

"We don't think he did it," he said slowly, "for we allow he wan't there; but we think he would of ef he'd had the chanst."—Youth's Companion.

"Safety First"

"Doesn't seem to be anybody at home. Where's the family?" asked the Billville visitor.

"Well," was the reply, "the children are off at school, an' last week the old lady left to take military 'trainin' in the preparedness camp."

"But—where's the old man?"

"Last seen of him, he was crawlin' into a storm-pit an' shuttin' the lid after him."—Atlanta Constitution.

Sorely Disappointed

"Why do ye look so sorrowful, Dennis?"

"I just hear-r-d wan man call another a liar, and the man that was called a liar said the other man would have to apologize, or there would be a fight."

"And why should that make you look so sad?"

"The other man apologized!"—Pall Mall Gazette.

Perfectly Simple

During a school tea a kindly English lady sat regarding one of the young guests with evident alarm. Undismayed by the lady's glances, the young hopeful demolished plate after plate of bread and butter and cake. At last the lady could stand it no longer. Going up to the urchin, she said:

"My boy, have you never read any book which would tell you what to eat, what to drink, and what to avoid?"

"Why, bless yer, ma'am," replied the young gentleman, with his mouth full of cake, "I don't want no book. It's very simple. I eat all I can, I drink all I can, an' I avoids bustin'."—Louisville Herald.

A Gloomy View

The five-year-old daughter of an army officer at Fort Hamilton was returning from Sunday School a short time ago when she met a friend of the family who asked her where she had been.

"Jus' to Sunday School," she said.

"And what did you do there?" questioned the friend.

"Oh, we jus' sang sad songs about heaven," answered the child.

Not Reckless

Jake Penticoff came to seek aid from the city fathers.

"I gotta haff a sack of flour," said Jake. "I'm all out, and my family iss starfin'."

"All right, Jake," said the official. "If you need flour and have no money, we'll get you a sack. But see here, Jake, there's a circus coming, and if we get your flour are you sure that you will not sell it and take your family to the circus?"

"Oh, no," said Jake; "I already got dat safed up. Yas, I got money to go to te circus."—Youth's Companion.

Yes, William

As William bent over her fair face he whispered, "Darling, if I should ask you in French if I might kiss you, what would you say?"

Nancy, calling up her scanty knowledge of the French language exclaimed, "Billet doux." Pronounced Billy do.—Louisville Evening Post.

The Ideal Sort

"Jones is the finest after-dinner speaker I have ever heard."

"So?"

"Yes, he always says, 'Waiter, give that check to me.'"—Panther.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

"America First" Campaign to Americanize Millions of Immigrants Who Do Not Speak Our Language

A RECENT series of bulletins headed "America First Campaign," issued by the U. S. Bureau of Education for the purpose of urging all non-English-speaking immigrants to attend the free night schools and learn to speak and read our language, and appealing to all patriotic citizens to assist in inducing these immigrants to attend night school, shows that the government has at last opened its eyes to the necessity of doing something to Americanize the large and rapidly increasing element of our population which is foreign by birth and prefers to remain foreign in language, interest and affiliation.

Startling developments at home and abroad in connection with the great war have revealed the menace to our national welfare of having in this country millions of immigrants who, though with us, are not of us because they do not understand our language or our institutions and, worse yet, do not care to learn. Segregating themselves into separate communities consisting of people from their respective native lands they constitute foreign colonies in all our large cities, industrial centers and even in many rural districts. Although they have come here to escape oppression or for a better field of opportunity, yet with unreasoning inconsistency they refuse to identify themselves with the interests of this country but rather continue to venerate those old world social and political notions which in practise in the land of their birth have produced the undesirable conditions they have fled from. Unfortunately this characteristic is not monopolized by any one class of immigrants though those of some nationalities are more clannish than others.

It has been noted by eminent authority, and it is unquestionably true, that the amazing strength of Germany is largely due to the fact that her people are practically homogeneous, being of the same racial origin, speaking one language and having the same national ideals and ambitions, while the comparative weakness of her Austrian ally results from the multiplicity of races and peoples composing the Austro-Hungarian Empire, consisting of the kingdoms of Austria and Hungary and the former kingdom of Bohemia, each peopled by a different race with a language of its own and traditional jealousy of the other members of the empire, and added to this triple discord is the unrest of the Roumanian, Servian and Italian speaking provinces under Austrian dominion. The moral of this object lesson in Europe is further enforced by the trouble which hyphenated citizenship in the United States has caused our people and our government in consequence of many of our foreign-born citizens treating the interests of the respective countries whence they emigrated as paramount to those of America.

Previous to the outbreak of the present war immigration to the United States had reached the enormous figures of nearly a million and a half annually. A large part of this, especially that from the degraded nations of Asia and Africa should have been excluded as unfit for American citizenship, and even as to those coming from Europe care should have been taken to admit only such as manifested the capacity and sincere desire to become American citizens in the full sense, renouncing all foreign allegiance and unreservedly identifying their future interests with the welfare of this country whose hospitality they sought for the betterment of their condition.

For a large portion of our people to remain foreign in their ideas, their prejudices, their interests and their allegiance endangers our domestic tranquility and jeopardizes our peaceful relations with foreign powers. It cannot and must not be tolerated. Not being able to speak and read the language of our country is about the surest preventive against becoming Americanized.

By all means encourage every immigrant to attend school, day school if of school age, night school if grown up, and learn to speak and read our language for his or her own benefit as well as for the good of the community. Employers of foreign-born labor have joined heartily in the efforts of the government to induce immigrants to attend the night schools and many of them have scheduled an advance of wages to those who learn our language. One of the government bulletins says that the foreign language press is to advocate the proposition, but apparently the existence of these foreign language papers and magazines has prevented many immigrants from taking the trouble to learn to read English by furnishing them with reading matter in their own language. They could help the cause immensely if they would duplicate in English in parallel columns the most interesting parts of their publications, and it would not be unreasonable for our government to require this as conditional to their use of the mails.

Surprising Decrease in Infant Mortality In Germany During the War

PUBLISHED statistics show that the annual death rate in Germany, which for all ages and classes was 14 per thousand of population in 1913, the last year of peace, rose to nearly 20 per thousand in the second year of the war and is still rising. Such a result was to have been expected and, considering that the soldiers are included in the tabulations and that the stress of war with scarcity of food and curtailment of other necessaries is not conducive to health and longevity, the increased ratio of deaths seems moderate.

But the remarkable feature of the report is the statement, with figures to prove it, that the infant mortality rate has diminished considerably during the war. Infant mortality means the death rate among children under the age of one year, and it is stated in terms of the ratio of deaths to births.

In Germany in 1913, the year before the war, the infant death rate was 14.1 per hundred births, a very creditable showing. The war began the first of August, 1914, and that year infant mortality rose to 15.6 per hundred births, an increase rationably attributable to war conditions which prevailed during the last five months of the year, although they had not become acute in their effect on living conditions at that time. Since then, as scarcity of food and especially of milk, with deprivation of other comforts and necessaries has become more and more pinching, the natural expectation would be for the infant death rate to rise with the prolongation of the war. But the astonishing fact is that from this point, instead of rising it has steadily declined. From 15.6 infant deaths per hundred births in 1914 it dropped to 14.5 in 1915 and is now down to 12.9, which is so much below the best figures (14.1) in time of peace as to clearly indicate the working of some war-induced factor that is favorable and powerful enough in its influence to more than counterbalance the ill effects of all the war conditions that are unfavorable to life and health of babies.

Searching the field over we can find only one possible explanation, but that one appears adequate and conclusive in the light of positive scientific knowledge of infant hygiene. Strange as it may seem, the milk famine, the dearth of cow's milk, stands out as the probable cause of saving the lives of so many German babies during the last two years. Our sympathies have been aroused by the publication of pathetic but ineffectual appeals to Great Britain to permit the proposed shipment of cargoes of American condensed milk to save the German babies from starvation. No doubt older children, adults and especially the sick and feeble in Germany have suffered from deprivation of milk as, indeed, they have from shortage of eggs, meat, butter and flour, but not so with the young babes to whom, in fact, the milk famine has been and is a positive blessing in that it compels their mothers to give them the food which Nature designed for them but is denied their offspring by too many present-day women.

In the article on "Prevention of Whooping Cough Among Babies," in last March COMFORT, Dr. Beveridge says: "The great modern menace is the bottle-fed baby." He explains that the bottle-fed not only are less healthy than the breast-fed in infancy but that the weakening effect of the poor start which the former get as babies lingers and makes their frail bodies more susceptible to the ravages of disease through childhood, and to illustrate he points to the fact that "eight out of every ten babies who come down with whooping cough are babies that have had their start on the bottle and that the mortality is very great with these while with the breast-fed it is very slight."

The U. S. government, through the bulletins issued by its Children's Department, urges all mothers to make every effort to nurse their infants. Experts who have made a special study of the matter produce figures which show that out of every hundred bottle-fed babies an average of thirty die in their first year while of the breast-fed babies only about seven out of every hundred die in their first year. We trust the mothers of America will take the lesson to heart without the exigency of a milk famine or a war blockade.

Don't Gamble by Relying on One Crop

IT may be sound policy for the farmer to specialize somewhat but not to the extent of limiting his efforts to the raising of any one crop. To stake an entire season's investment of time, labor and money on the outcome of one kind of crop is too much of a gamble on weather, destructive pests and market conditions. The farmer can and should minimize the risk by diversified farming so that, if one crop fails or proves unprofitable because of overproduction and a glutted market, he still has several chances of making good on his other crops. This is forcibly illustrated by the experiences of the cotton planters who have suffered so much damage from the boll-weevil and then, when they succeeded in raising a large crop the year the present war broke out, it was hard to find a market for it even at prices below the cost of production. The apple men were equally troubled in disposing of their large crop that same fall, and two years ago the enormous grapefruit crop hardly paid for picking and shipping.

Another reason in favor of diversified farming is that rotation of crops improves the fertility of the soil and subdues the insect pests and plant diseases with which the land becomes infested by raising the same crop year after year. We read in Southern agricultural bulletins that the cotton boll-weevil is a blessing in disguise because it is forcing the cotton planters to practise diversified farming and crop rotation instead of depending entirely on the ups and downs of cotton.

Every farmer should also raise a variety of live stock including always cows, hogs and poultry besides the necessary work animals, and some sheep where conditions are favorable. In this way, instead of impoverishing his land by selling all his crops he will feed out a large part on the farm, thereby adding to the fertility of the soil, and will market a part of his products in the form of beef, veal, lamb, poultry, eggs and dairy products, for all which there is a continually increasing demand and an upward trend of prices Pellagra, the dread disease that is caused by insufficient nourishment, has become alarmingly prevalent among farm people in the South because their diet is deficient in milk, eggs, meat, peas and beans, all which they might raise in abundance.

Clubby's Regeneration

By Joseph F. Novak

See front cover illustration.

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

HAD "Clubby" known his correct name, undoubtedly he would have scorned it. For that name was no other than the extravagantly sounding, "Leander St. John." Clubby was the offspring of a near-aristocrat whose heritage had been more money than brains, and a foolish virgin who had married the near-aristocrat in haste lest the monetary reward such a union would bring would escape her. She paid for her folly later, by being deserted by her near-aristocratic husband, and when Clubby was born, she passed away to her reward, her only happiness being the fact that she had been a lawfully wedded wife.

Clubby was then left to the mercies of the boarding-house keeper within whose establishment his mother had died. The leathery-hearted female kept Clubby until she had given him what she considered was two hundred dollars' worth of care, that being the amount of money she took from under the pillow of Clubby's mother, when she felt quite sure that the dead woman would not stretch out her wan hand in protest.

By the time Clubby was five years old, he was an old hand at trotting about the city streets selling papers. He generally sold them quickly, for the kind-hearted public felt a pang of pity for the little waif, and often gave him more than the penny he asked for his newspaper. Their generosity was promptly gobbled up by the harridan of the boarding-house, who, not content with seizing his inheritance, took his small earnings for his "keep." It was she, who once, in drunken humor, kicked him across the room, injuring his ankle so that when he became better, it was only to find himself burdened with a clubfoot, whence came his name, "Clubby."

When Clubby became seven years of age, a crisis in his life came. Up to this time, his earning capacity in the newspaper business had been steadily on the decline. He was getting to be just as any other little ragged newsy of the street, and he had been gradually losing the pitiful attraction that brought him to the attention of the public. Now he was simply a "bow-legged kid," or "a pigeon-toed brat."

If he didn't sell enough papers, he dared not go home, and so stayed out all night. For this, however, he did not care. He almost preferred the streets to his squalid hole in the boarding house. And so, if he did not go there, he'd trot to some convenient dark doorway or hall, and there curl up and snuggle down as a little dog might, and sleep the sleep of the street urchin. He didn't need much space, only a little corner sufficed.

Clubby was a child of the streets; sometimes he was an object of pity. He didn't know it, however, because he knew nothing of pity, kindness and generosity. If he thought at all about the great unfeeling world in which he existed, it was very likely those thoughts concerned keeping out of everybody's way.

After Clubby was seven, he ceased almost entirely to go to the boarding-house which had been the only home he had ever known. For he found he could knock around town better and at the same time be at the scene of his business all the time. Keeping the irregular hours that he did, it was rather difficult to say when Clubby's day commenced and when it ended. Time was rolled into one mass with him. He was on the streets all the day trying to sell papers. Between editions, he slept, so this made him wide-awake enough to attend the after-theater crowds with the latest sensation. By the time the cafes emptied out, it was pretty late, so Clubby snatched another few hours of sleep, and was up for the early morning editions. He slept when he had nothing else to do, ate whenever he had enough pennies to buy himself a frugal meal, and when times were dull, and sleep would not come, he joined in any of the mischief that his colleagues suggested. Clubby, however, was generally cautious in this respect, for his clubfoot was not a help in flight.

Thus time's cycle went on for him. He didn't know much, and he didn't care. Nobody took any interest in him, and he took no interest in anything in turn. But wait, there was one thing that Clubby was becoming interested in this year. That was Christmas.

Christmas was a time when the big store windows showed a most wonderful assortment of things; when men stood on the street corners and wound up distractingly interesting mechanical toys that ran and danced and jumped and buzzed. Then there were the men who made the little woolly dolls dance—Clubby wondered how they did it! Then there were the green wreaths with the red berries which looked so nice that one almost felt like eating them, though they weren't good to eat as Clubby knew, for he had tried it. Then there were the tall green Christmas trees on which hung all sorts of beautiful glittery things.

Yes, Christmas was something beautiful and grand and it must be coming soon now since all these signs of its coming were beginning to appear. He had heard too, that there was going to be given to all the newsies, a dinner, at which turkey and potatoes would be served, besides all sorts of other good things including candy. Clubby liked candy.

If he could only go to that big dinner! But Pete, who had sometimes been kind to him, had become angry with him for taking away a customer, and told him that if he asked anyone else about that dinner, or if he'd be there, he (Pete) would punch Clubby's head. So Clubby didn't ask anyone else. He was afraid of Pete.

The days passed, and Christmas was approaching. It must be very near to the day, Clubby reasoned, since the streets were getting so crowded and people carried such big bundles. What would Christmas bring him?

That was his thought as he walked, or rather, pulled his way through the big crowds on the street that evening.

As he went along, in a big store he saw a blazing sign: "Only One Day to Christmas!" Only one day! Then this very night must be the night of the big dinner! Pete was still angry with him, and unless Pete relented that big dinner would pass up Clubby. But where could he find Pete?

Clubby had sold very few papers that day. He hadn't but three cents, and those he must keep to pay for his papers the next morning. Ah, it was a hard world to be sure.

Clubby was hungry and tired, and the night was dark and slushy. The big, heavy white snowflakes fell, whitening the street, and forming on the sidewalks in a sticking, wet, slippery mass.

Clubby's hope was slowly dying out. There was nothing left for him to do unless perhaps, it would be to go to his old boarding-house. The boarding-house keeper might give him a bit to eat and a place to sleep. Yes, he'd go, and if she wasn't cross, he'd ask her for something to eat, but if she was, he'd gently sneak in and be quiet. At least he would be sheltered from the storm.

With this plan in mind, Clubby started off. He went the length of the business district, then passed into the more quiet streets. He walked a good many blocks down a boulevard on which stood many beautiful residences. Many had been sold by their owners since the street was becoming a business thoroughfare, but many of them were still used for residential purposes.

Clubby kept on until he sighted a policeman. Clubby feared policemen. They were awful people. So he turned off the boulevard and went down a sloppy snow-and-slush street that ran parallel with the boulevard.

As he walked down this street, he came to a wagon lunch-counter. It was a little affair with a glass front. Within the proprietor stood among his stores of food, looking well-fed and contented in the flaring lights. On the open counter was an array of sandwiches wrapped in waxed paper, within easy reach of the transient customer. There were also doughnuts, and cuts of pies. Under a glass case were raw steaks and chops, while in a pan, presided over by the proprietor, sizzed a regiment of "red-hots." They sent up a delicious aroma that tempted Clubby's cold little nose and quaking stomach.

He paused before this lunch counter for several minutes. Then all of a sudden, he really didn't know how he did it, his hand snatched one of the sandwiches in the waxed paper and he cut down the street.

The yell the proprietor sent up seemed like the curses of seven devils. In dismay at the fact that he had really "swiped" something, Clubby ran on, and turned into a dark alley. He hid behind a garbage can, and quaked there until all was quiet.

Fear for the moment had taken away his hunger, but now it renewed its attacks on his stomach. "If they git me, they'll put me in," he philosophized, "so I'm goin' to eat, it anyway," and forthwith he did.

The sandwich disposed of, and his foot feeling rested after the exertion he had put it to, Clubby got up and looked cautiously about. It would not do to go out into the street again, perhaps a policeman was watching the alley. So he started down it, until he came to a large gate which had not been pulled to, entirely. Through the small aperture he wriggled, and found himself in a yard of large proportions surrounded by a high, iron fence. A big building rose indistinctly in the falling snow in front of him; it faced the boulevard, he knew.

At his side was another smaller building; that was the garage. Funny that the door of that was open a bit, too. The people must be very careless, Clubby thought, but anyhow it was shelter, so he ducked in. In the gloom he described the vague outlines of a big automobile.

"It's late, an' I guess th' geezer what owns this's gone to bed. Ooh, how I'd like to sit in it!"

Clubby climbed on the clear running board of the big machine, and hoisted himself to the front seat. He threw out his thin little chest—how fine he was, just like the swell guys who rode in automobiles! He saw the electric button and his fingers itched to touch it and have it send forth a growl in the manner which those did which stood at the curb when he and his mischievous companions pressed them when there was no one around. But Clubby conquered the desire. Then as his fingers touched the electric switch, the car illumined. He quickly turned out the lights lest he be discovered, but in doing so, he found out that he could allow the small inner light to burn. This was pleasant for the little light felt very nice to the cold skin of his hand.

As he examined the different levers and brakes, he suddenly noticed a wonderful thing lying on the floor of the machine. It was a big golden locket with a great sparkling stone in it. The big stone threw off all colors of the rainbow when the light struck it. There was a little twisted loop at the top of the golden thing—it must have broken and the gentleman who owned the car must have lost it.

Clubby picked up the beautiful thing. Gee, it must cost nearly a dollar and ninety-eight cents, anyhow, for it looked like one that he saw in the window of a store and marked that much. Maybe if he handed it to the gentleman who lost it, he might give him a few pennies for keeping it safe for him.

He put it into his pocket. Yes, that's what he'd do, as soon as the light came. Even if the gentleman didn't give him anything, perhaps he wouldn't mind or be mad if he had slept in the car for the night.

Over the robe-rail hung a big woolly blanket, so big and heavy that Clubby could hardly lift it. Clubby dragged it over the back of the seat to the front seat. How warm it felt, how nice! Clubby pulled it about his little shoulders, and sat in calm delight on the floor. Jiminy, wasn't it great?

He sat with his back resting against the door of the car, the light sparkling in his eyes. But he must turn out the light now, for he was getting sleepy. Yes, he must turn—out—the—the—light—because if someone saw him—and knew he—had the golden—thing in his pocket——

But the light burned on, and Clubby's soul was winged away to slumberland.

CHAPTER II.

Palmer Northcross sat before the library grate, smiling to himself and smoking a cigar. He was happy, happy though he was all alone that Christmas Eve. His parents were abroad, so was sweet Robina West, but with a letter such as he had received from her that morning, what chap would not be happy?

Northcross was rich—or rather, he was a rich man's son. Robina had promised to marry him when he had ten thousand dollars in cash, earned through his own efforts. Robina was a girl of ideals. And so, instead of going abroad with his parents and with Robina (who was in his mother's party and chaperoned by her), he stayed at home to earn the ten thousand dollars, for Robina, though she said she would be happier if he were along, still was set in her determination not to wed him until he had fulfilled her condition.

So he had remained at home, and worked hard, and was now on his tenth thousand, which he hoped, would soon be earned. His money, too, had been made legitimately, from hard work and judicious saving.

In the letter which he held, Robina had invited him to join her, as soon as the condition was complied with. "And let us hope it will be quick, Palmer dear," she wrote.

Instead of going out that Christmas Eve, he decided to stay at home. "We'll spend Christmas together in spirit, my Robina," he smiled happily, as he let his thoughts wander to the rose-covered meadows of the future when he would call Robina West his own. What better pastime could he find than reading her letter as often as he chose, and wandering with her in the land of fancy on Christmas Eve? And so he dozed, and smoked and smiled, and read the letter in the big room which breathed the spirit of Christmas, for there was a gayly decked Christmas tree which his servants had trimmed up at his laughing order; a great sheaf of holly glowed in a big vase upon the table whereon reposed a great pile of presents that had come from numerous friends, and from abroad. Well, he might just as well open them up.

He took out his watch, then suddenly noted that his charm was gone. A thrill of horror passed over him. Where had he lost it? Would he, could he, ever recover it? It had been given to him by his mother, and he prized it highly. He tried to recall when last he had it; he knew he had it before he left the office. Perhaps he may have dropped it in the car.

He jumped up and seized his hat, and plunged through the deep snow on the drive to the garage. He noted a faint light—had he left the lights burning?

He pushed open the door, and stepped in and for a moment forgot his quest as he gazed upon the picture that came to his eye.

In the light of the little electric, the fine lines of the big automobile loomed up; bundled before the front seats in the big woolly blanket with head back and mouth slightly opened, a little waif lay, fast asleep.

The garage was chilly; the waif breathed heavily. Northcross stood with fingers at his lip for a moment, then opened the foredoor and gently gathered up the woolly bundle, boy and all, into his arms.

Recalling his quest, he glanced quickly around. He saw nothing of the lost watch-charm, so giving it up as lost for the present, he carried the blanketed waif into the house and laid him into a big, soft Morris chair.

"There!" he breathed with amusement. "We'll see what it has to say when it wakes up!"

He straightened out the crouched little figure so that the lad rested more comfortably, an exclamation of pity escaping him as he noted the clubfoot.

"Poor little waif; poor 'Clubs'," he said, unconsciously designating the lad by almost the same name by which he was known.

Northcross sat down and studied the lines of the wan face.

"Poor kid! I guess I ought to make a Christmas for him," he mused. "I haven't any toys, and it's pretty nearly too late to get him some. Wonder if there's anything in those packages to attract a child," he went on, talking to himself. "Mayhap the folks sent some souvenirs of a kiddish character."

He opened the bundles but found little, then suddenly recalling that he had brought home a bunch of "cotillion junk" from an affair a few nights before, he went up-stairs for it. There was plenty of it to amuse a child, odd caps, tissue paper novelties, and other truck. He often brought these favors home for a little youngster who lived in the neighborhood, whose mother was a washerwoman and whose father was a drunkard. And as for candies, nuts, fruits and sweets, well, Northcross had always been ashamed of his sweet-tooth.

He collected the stuff and went back to the library, stopping short in the doorway to observe the lad who had awakened and was sitting in rapt wonder at the Christmas tree. Then suddenly the lad turned from his cynosure and caught Northcross's eye. The gentleman, thereupon, deposited the truck underneath the tree, and switched on the lights, and the tree burst into a blaze of color.

This done, he went and stood before his tiny guest.

"Hello, kid!" he began.

"Hello," returned the waif, a little shyly.

"What's your name?"

"Clubby."

"Clubby what?"

"Not Clubby What, jus' Clubby," returned the little fellow.

"Um huh," grunted Northcross companionably, and then he said nothing more but watched his quasi-protege and waited for him to speak.

"I say, Sport," Clubby began finally, "you don't care if I call you 'Sport' do you?" (He threw in the query a bit diffidently). "You look like a swell one."

Northcross took the appellation in its complimentary sense and nodded negatively.

"Well, say, Sport, ain't I dreamin'?"

"Well, Clubby, do you think you are?"

"Yes, I guess so," Clubby responded.

"Would you like to dream like this all the time?" Northcross questioned.

"Yes, 'cause this don't seem like no dream. Everything seems like real, on'y I know it can't be."

"That so? Well, suppose you pretend it is real?" Northcross suggested. "Get up and move around."

"Kin I?"

"Sure, kid, sure!"

Clubby threw aside the big blanket, and stood up. "I know it's a dream 'cause I fell asleep in the ga-raz and this ain't no ga-raz. But this ain't one o' them no clubfoot dreams."

"No club-foot dreams?"

"Yes. Lots o' times when I dream, I ain't got no clubfoot."

"I see." (The light must have bothered Northcross's eyes, for he closed them for a moment. To rest them, undoubtedly).

"Well, suppose you enjoy your dream while it lasts."

"Oh, I'm afraid soon's I do, I'll wake up."

"No, you won't. Don't be afraid. Just go ahead and enjoy your dream."

What a time the two boys had! They played with the electric switch, turning the lights on and off as often as they pleased; anything that

A Christmas Party

By Nancy Gunter

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

HAVE you ever planned a quiet Christmas, just with mother and the folks, and then suddenly found that the dearest girl friend you have would be with you for two days during the holidays?

That is what happened to me, and, more than that, my dear friend Polly was an orphan, and had never had many parties, so I was determined that she should have a Christmas party, although we were isolated in the country by a heavy snow. Of course the "grownups" said it was impossible to entertain under such conditions, but I knew Polly would enjoy helping, so I persuaded mother to send out invitations for the next evening while Polly and I planned the party.

The decorations were the problem that came first, and we solved it easily, because the woods were full of evergreens. I took three old straw hats, cut off the brims and covered the crowns thickly with evergreens until I had formed three jolly Christmas bells. One was hung in the center of the sitting-room, one over the dining-room table, and in the third one I fastened a small dining-bell. Then father fixed it over the front door, with a long red ribbon attached so that our guests could ring it, and it gave a delightfully festive appearance to the front porch. Strings of evergreens and Christmas wreaths completed the decorations of the rooms.

In the dining-room we arranged a table from which to serve refreshments and it was particularly attractive. The bell hung from the ceiling and beneath it stood the table covered with snowy damask and with ropes of greenery going from the bell to each corner of the table. Flat on the table we placed a Christmas wreath of holly and in the middle of the wreath put a lamp with a red paper shade which cast a soft, bright light over the table. With dishes of popcorn balls and nuts, apples and raisins placed about, our table was decidedly tempting.

Everything looked pretty when we had finished, but now arose the vexing question of "what to do with our guests when they had arrived?" Polly and I put our heads together, thought ever so hard, and finally planned a Santa Claus sale, which proved a great success. This was the way we managed it and if you have never had one you don't know what fun really is. Mother and I had made up dozens of stockings from some old red calico, and while we were doing this Polly concocted some splendid candy, fudge, pully taffy, and peanut brittle. Then we had stuffed the stockings out with wads of paper, adding a switch or so and a few boxes of ashes and sawdust, until they all looked like the bulgiest and best of Christmas stockings. Into a few of them, however, we put Polly's candy, also nuts and apples. Jimmie—who is only fourteen but has lots of sense—was transformed into the queerest Santa Claus you ever saw by tying on a white cotton batting beard and wig, and putting on a red sweater adorned with cotton ermine, high boots and a red flannel cap.

When the guests arrived, we gave each twenty hickory nuts, and brother Jimmy—dressed as Santa Claus—auctioned off the stockings for the nuts, amidst roars of laughter. Of course it was luck, pure and simple, when a guest won a stocking filled with goodies, and Santa was well enough acquainted with the crowd to venture jesting remarks about the proverbial "bad little boy" to those who got only sawdust and paper in their stockings.

Our next game was a contest that Polly and I had devised after earnest consultation with the dictionary. For this we passed around little Christmas bells cut from red and green cardboard and tied with Christmas ribbon. All girls like to have favors to remember a party by, and Polly and I made up booklets so attractive that our guests could keep them for souvenirs. On an inner sheet was written the contest verses, and how it did set that crowd to thinking! The blanks were all to be filled in with words beginning with "Ex;" each word in these verses beginning with "X" was left blank.

An Xmas Xtravaganza

That X-mas night so cold and clear
Filled Santa with Xceeding cheer
As Xpeditely in he crept.

But now's Xposed a sorry sight
Young Harry's moans his tears Xcite
Xcusable he wept.

"Xtremely small, this diamond ring
I can't Xtend so mean a thing," Xclaims the mournful Harry.

"To Xquisite Lucy Grey, whose gold,
Is most Xcessive, I am told,
Yet she, Eclusively, I'd marry."

Old Santa's wise, I must Xplain
To Xorcise young Harry's pain,
Xpertly he did advise.

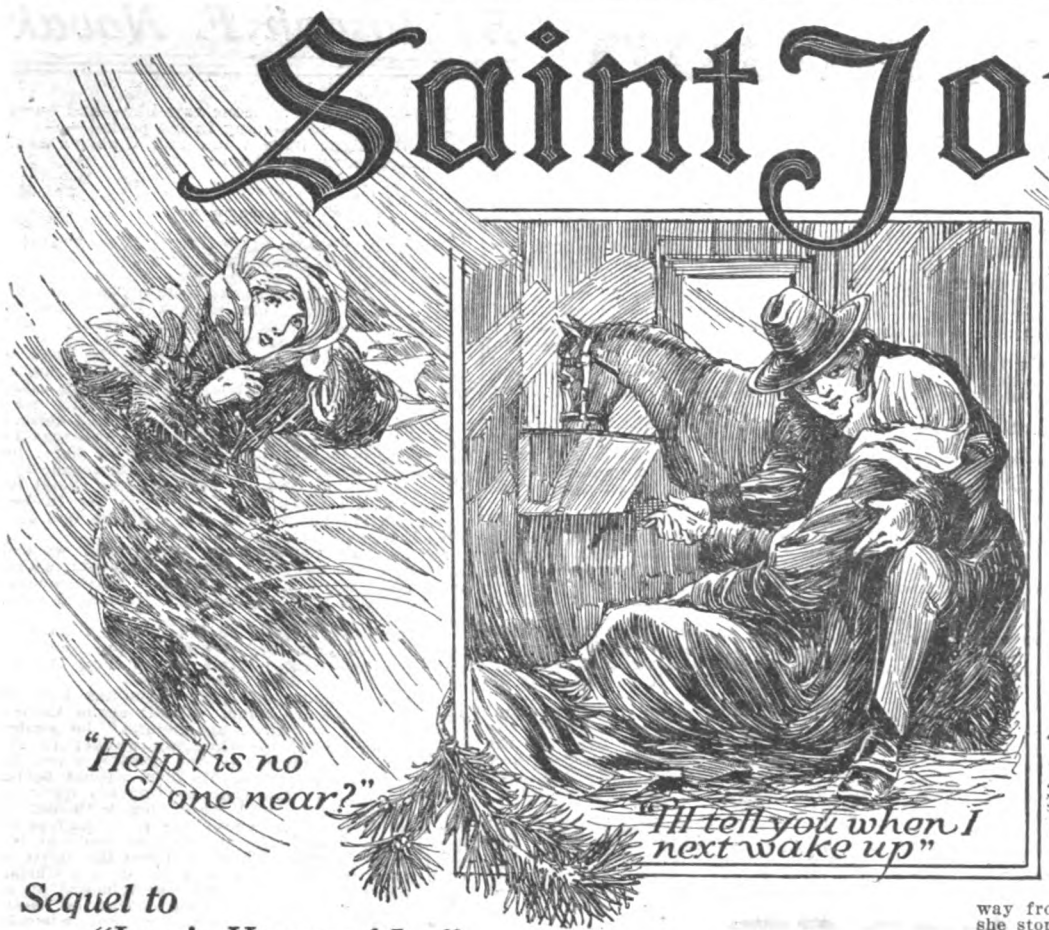
"Xert a little sense," quoth he
"Send your gift Xpeditiously,
Love will Xalt its size."

Xultant, Lucy seized the treasure,
Xpressed her joy without measure
Xclaimed that she would wed.

Said Santa, "I'm Xecrably stupid
Xploiting myself in role of Cupid,"
So, self-Xiled, he fled.

We let the guests puzzle over this for twenty minutes, and try to fill in the blanks properly, then each signed his booklet, and we collected them. All who had make a correct list were entitled to cut for the prize, which in our case was a miniature fruit cake, decorated with a sprig of holly. Mother had made the cake when "trying out" her batter, but a copy of Van Dyke's "Otherwise Man," or of Dickens' "Christmas Carol," would be perhaps as suitable. For a booby prize Polly and I had blown out an egg-shell and colored it green with dye from a bit of cloth. We pasted this upright on a red cardboard base and wrote around the base, "Let us Xggs-hort you to study the dictionary."

During the evening we had served lemonade from the dining-room table, and after the contest we brought out our refreshments. These were simple but they looked pretty, for we had chosen to typify the Christmas star in our edibles. Red gelatine in a star-shaped mold, was palatable and attractive, and mother had covered star-shaped cookies with icing colored with beet juice.



With our gelatine and cakes we gathered about the fire and popped corn, and roasted apples and chestnuts while we told of other Christmases. This day, however, meant more to us than a mere feast of gaiety, so when it grew late, we went to the piano and closed our evening with the old carols and hymns, handed down from our English forebears.

"Oh, little town of Bethlehem,
How still I see thee lie,
Above thy deep and dreamless sleep
The silent stars go by."

While we sang I placed a lantern made from a box on the piano. It had a large star-shaped opening through which the light filtered softly through white tissue paper. We then slipped about the room, turning out the other lights until the Christmas star shone out alone, closing our merry evening most impressively.

THE snow was falling so rapidly and thickly that the snow-plows on the Wyoming and Western Railroad were kept constantly busy clearing the slender rails, for these were the only link between the little town of Faraway and the outer world. The telegraph wires had been down for some hours and no one could tell when the Chicago Limited would go through.

June Valera and her stalwart husband had been waiting four hours in the little wooden station for the arrival of the train which was to bring them their first guest from the East,—the first since their marriage on the May day of the spring previous. As June looked at her watch and saw the time her face grew serious. "I feel I must go home, Sweetheart," she said to her husband. "I dare not stay longer. We have to ride twenty miles through this snow and in two hours it will be dark. But I cannot let Maude arrive with no one here to meet her. What can we do?"

Juan Valera looked adoringly into the trusting blue eyes raised to his. Maude or no Maude, his sweet wife must be gotten back to Casa Alegre without delay. How had he ever dared let her leave its warm shelter for this wild ride, and in her delicate health, too! Saying not a word he suddenly picked her up in his strong young arms and bore her swiftly out to the waiting sleigh, tucked her in carefully and calling to his servant to await the guest at the station with the extra horses and see her safely home, he started off with a flourish for Casa Alegre, their ranch home, twenty miles away. June knew it was useless to protest,—in fact she didn't want to protest, she only wanted her own fireside, a hot drink, her own soft bed, and her maid Pepita.

Now the servant, Felipe, had no mind to spend the night at the lonely railway station. He could hear no train coming, a blizzard was certainly upon them and this was no place for a good Christian on a stormy winter's night—at Christmas time too. So when the depot clock had ticked off another hour, and the glistening rails were again blanketed with snow, and no rumble of any train could be heard, Felipe saddled one of the horses and told the depot master that he was off.

"Bad luck to you," yelled that worthy, "to leave me here alone."

"Come with me then, you fool," cried Felipe. "Leave the door unlocked and the fire banked and come on to the hotel. It'll be black night in another hour. I've left the bay mare in the shed for the gal that's comin'."

The depot master shook his head, but as Felipe disappeared into the whiteness of the falling snow his suggestion sank into the mind of the man left behind and he soon began to argue that the train was probably stalled,—a washout or a blockade or a bridge down. "It won't be along before daybreak any way," he muttered. If he should go to the tavern—now was the time before darkness had fully come. And again it came true that he who hesitates is lost, for after he fixed the fire in the little stove, hung out another lantern and pocketed the money in the drawer, he slammed the door of the station and trudged off into the snow.

Thus it was that when the Chicago Limited rolled and creaked and groaned in its efforts to stop somewhere near the station at one o'clock in the morning, there was no one to meet the slender dark-haired girl who alighted from a sleeper. "I don't like to leave you here this way," said the kindly conductor, who helped her off.

"Oh, I must get off here," replied Maude Bently with a queer little laugh, "but thank you for your interest."

"I feel better about it, because I have another passenger for Faraway too. A man. He was in another car. Your friends are probably asleep in the station yonder."

"I d n't see any station," said Maude, half trembling.

"It ought to be right off there, but this snow has covered up its lights I guess. Well, so long. All ab-o-a-r-d," and the brightly lighted train moved slowly but surely on, leaving the girl standing on a snow-bank in total darkness. She stood still thinking rapidly. Not a light to be seen, nor did a sound of any kind break the awful stillness after the rumble of the train had died away. "God in heaven," she breathed. "Show me what to do,—which way to go." Then she remembered the other passenger, the man. What was he like? Where was he? Dare she call out to him? Was he a cow-boy or a parson or a train robber? She decided to walk on—somewhere—and wait developments. So she stumbled through the snow until her hand, outstretched before her, felt a baggage truck and she knew she was going in the right direction. But no station lights were visible, and after a few minutes she called out in desperation, "help! Is there no one near?" Silence, save for the slight howl of the wind and the whirr of the falling snow. She crept carefully a few feet from the truck in hopes of finding the building. Then she called aloud: "Oh, June Mortimer Valera! Why did I leave my happy home for you?" She ended with a hysterical sob. And then she heard a noise. Footsteps were certainly coming, padding their way over the snow.

"Did I hear a voice? Did some one call?" came through the darkness.

"Oh, yes. Right this way. Are you the other passenger from the express?"

"Right-o!" answered the hearty masculine voice. The conductor told me to keep an eye on his other passenger for Faraway, but my eye couldn't find you."

Floundering more than knee deep in the snow, chilled to the bone, Maude Hastings turned in the direction of his voice, and soon felt herself clasped in strong arms, but whether they were the arms of a respectable rancher or a desperado she did not know. They were human arms, and they were strong and warm. For the moment, in her intense relief, that was enough.

"L t's back out the way I came. I dare not turn around for fear I'll lose all sense of direction," he said. "I've found a building. Whether it is the station or a shed I don't know. As near as I can remember Faraway depot I should say what I have found must be the shed for horses."

"Oh, then you are a stranger here like me," she said breathlessly as she faced the wind.

"Hardly. I've had a job here for four years,—that is to say in this vicinity. This your first visit?"

"My very first, and my last."

He laughed boyishly.

"Perhaps not. You are seeing us at our worst just now. We aren't like this all the time. Now here we are by the building," then as a whinny of welcome sounded very near them he cried, "It is the shed and there's a horse inside."

"That means we can leave at once, doesn't it? My friends will be so worried."

"Looks like they were worried," he muttered sarcastically as he unfastened the door and dragge' her in. The air here was warmer, owing to the presence of the horse, and Maude exclaimed:

"How good this feels. Must we leave it at once?"

"No, indeed! I dare not stir from here till dawn. I might lose my way even when hunting for the station. It is quite a ways from the shed. You must be made as comfortable as possible right here. When old Sol appears we will explore. As far as setting out on the horse is concerned in this blizzard, why—it is out of the question. Here put your arms around the horse's neck,—I guess he is gentlemanly enough not to kick,—and get what warmth you can. And I will rub your arms." Maude obeyed obediently and soon slipped off her dripping traveling cloak and declared she felt much better.

"Oh, if you hadn't been here!" she cried suddenly, seizing his arm in terror at the thought.

"But I am, thank God."

"I like to hear you say that," she said shyly. "I know you aren't a—a desperado." His laugh rang out.

"Well, we are both of us desperadoes in one sense. We are in a rather desperate plight. No knowing how long we shall have to stay here—or in the station. These early winter blizzards in Wyoming are no child's play. Can't we fix it so you can get some sleep? There is some hay in the corner I think, and I'll make a pillow for you, if you will lie down."

"How f r are we from the House of Joy?" she asked irrelevantly.

"I beg pardon, from what?"

"From the House of Joy?"

"She is a little light headed," he thought in dismay. "What ever can I do?"

"Yes, how far it is to June's House of Joy, the Casa Alegre?"

"Oh," exclaimed her companion, much relieved as a great light dawned on him. "Casa Alegre, The Valera Ranch? Are you going there? It is all of twenty miles. But why——"

"Do you know them, the Valeras? Have you ever robbed their house or stolen their cattle?" she asked with a laugh of delight.

"I've robbed them of many a good meal—but right at their dinner table. Charming people, the Valeras. Yes, I know them well. They are happy too." And a heavy sigh escaped him involuntarily.

"Yes, June writes me she is a perfectly happy woman, and that is rare nowadays. But who are you? Would you mind telling me?"

"A thousand pardons. I am their friend, Jonathan Black."

"Not the Mr. Black? The minister who married them on May day last?"

"I am that very same," he assented joyfully. "The Reverend Jonathan Black, Home Missioner, if you please. And now young woman, please hand me your visiting card."

His companion laughed and fumbling in her hand bag to find one, she was astonished when he struck a match. The flame flared up brightly for a minute and she started as she saw his face. "Oh," she cried, "you are the very one."

"The very one what?" and he smiled quizzically back into her eyes.

"The one I kept seeing in the diner all the way from Chicago and I thought I——" Then she stopped in utter confusion.

"Go on," he urged quietly. The match had gone out and he grasped her arms masterfully. "Tell me what it was you thought of the man in the diner." But she would not. "Must I wait for that?" he said gently.

"Yes. You must wait."

At length he burst out: "You haven't told me who you are. Is it possible,—are you by any means 'Maude?'"

"Oh, yes. I am Maude. Have you heard of her from June?"

"Continually. Maude is the girl of her heart, her mate she called you."

"Yes, I was her mate, But now,——" and a tear rolled down and splashed on his hand. He tightened his hold on her arm. "Now she has her true mate,—and—I am not needed."

"Not in the way you were, of course. But have you no mate of your own back in the East?" he asked softly.

"No. None at all. I have no one. Not a relative on earth nearer than a third cousin, sixty years old, and he has six children and sells calico and molasses at a corner grocery."

"Oh, Maude, Maude," he exclaimed. "You are delicious. A mate of the calico-molasses variety is an impossibility, I clearly see."

"Do you? I'm so glad you understand. So few people do. But I am wofully tired. Where is that hay?"

"Right over here. No, it must be here," as he fumbled around. "I don't want to waste my few matches. There doesn't seem to be any hay. The horse has eaten it I guess. Well, we must make the best of it. I'll sit down here in the corner and you lean against me so. Is that good? Is it comfortable? Don't be afraid of me? I just want you to be warm and easy. Try to go to sleep if you can," he said as her head sank into the hollow of his shoulder and he drew her wrap over her feet. "I'll keep awake."

"You go to sleep too," she murmured drowsily.

"I couldn't sleep a wink. I——"

"Y what?"

"I don't want to waste the time."

"What do you mean?"

"You must wait for my answer till you tell me what you thought of the man in the diner." And he drew her closer to him and rubbed his chin against her hair. She half started up and said laughingly, "I'll tell you when I next wake up, Mr. Black."

"Must I be Mr. Black? You are just Maude to me. We are not in a Chicago drawing-room standing on ceremony."

"I should say not,—Jonathan," she laughed happily as she settled back against his shoulder and prepared herself for sleep. But sleep wouldn't come. In fact she was wide awake. She was far too happy to sleep. In all her life she had never been so happy. She had never been at all happy before, she concluded. To think that the paragon in the diner should be the passenger for Faraway, should be June's staunch friend, the minister, that she should be sitting here in a horse-shed leaning against his arms,—it was no wonder that all desire to sleep had fled. She could sleep when she got to her bed in Casa Alegre, but now,—and she stirred uneasily.

"Awake, little one?" he whispered as he bent down to her.

"I believe I am," she whispered back lifting her face towards his. And then,—they neither could tell afterwards how it happened, but it did, and Maude found her lips against the minister's and their two souls seemed to melt and fuse into one.

"I have found my mate," he at last said brokenly. "The mate I have looked for and longed for always. And you?" and he kissed her again before she could answer. But the pressure of her lips told him everything. The horse whinnied as if in sympathy and at length Maude said as she caressed her lover's face:

"This is our House of Joy, isn't it Jonathan? Our Casa Alegre."

"Our House of Joy, sure enough. Anywhere with you is my house of joy. We are to be married soon, are we not, my mate? I want my mate, darling. Oh, the lonely hours I've spent riding over these mountains and valleys, with no one at the day's end to welcome me but my Indian housekeeper. I've prayed God again and again to lead me to my mate, to the one whom I could love and cherish, and the one who——"

"The one who would love you back, and would work for you and pray for you and take you for her very own," Maude interrupted half tearfully in the exuberance of her joy. "And Jonathan, we found each other, and we——"

"We didn't waste precious time in formalities either, sweet mate of mine. And we are not going to. Tomorrow is none too soon for us to wed. My little cabin, two miles from Casa Alegre, is ready and garnished for my bride, and we'll journey to the justice of the peace and get the knot tied."

"I want a Christian marriage, Jonathan. Why not a clergyman?"

"Because, sweetheart, I am the only one within a radius of two hundred miles, and this blizzard may continue for days or weeks, and we couldn't travel. Are you going to keep me waiting all that time, mate of mine? Don't you want to be with me before spring?"

"Spring? Oh, that's an age away," replied Maude as she clasped him tighter. "Now that we've found each other, now that God has put my hand in yours."

"And my lips on yours, like this—and this—and this, Sweetheart, I will not wait till spring. I have it," springing up. "Stand up, Maude. I am a clergyman, and I can perform our ceremony right now, and in the morning we will stop at the justice's and have everything fixed up legally. Now Maude say after me, 'I, Maude Hastings, do take thee, Jonathan Black, to be my lawfully wedded husband, and true mate,'" and slowly, solemnly Maude repeated the sacred words which bound her to this strangely found bridegroom forever. Then her lover repeated the same vows and their lips met in the nuptial kiss.

"Oh, mate of mine," breathed her husband. "God grant I may be as good to you as you deserve. Mme. Valera, June, has told me of your self-sacrificing life, nursing among the poor a destitute, working bravely on, sometimes for a mere pittance. You were a hero in my eyes months ago. And now to have you in my arms as my wife, my mate. God in heaven!" he exclaimed reverently, "Help me to be worthy of her."

"And June's letters have been full of your heroism and devotion to the scattered whites and Indians of this section, until in my prayers I have added every night, 'God bless St. Jonathan.'"

"Dearest, I think our courtship, betrothal and marriage the most sacred thing of my life. It is a direct answer to prayer. I needed you, Maude, and my heavenly Father filled my need. And may you ever be able to say the same. Come now, get some sleep and it will soon be dawn, when I'm sure your friends will send for you. What a surprise we will have in store for them."

It came about as he predicted. By nine o'clock the snow had ceased, then the sun came out, and soon a stout sleigh with a frightened driver came dashing up to the Faraway railroad station, Juan Valera's face was white and drawn. "My wife has been nearly frantic for fear something had happened to you, Miss Hastings."

"Something has happened, Mr. Juan," she said happily. "Your good friend here, Mr. Black, took care of me," and she smiled mischievously. "But let's bundle in, for I am in a hurry to see June. And we have an errand on the way."

Five miles from the station lived the justice of the peace, and Mr. Black told Juan to stop a few minutes as he had an important errand. "You get out, and come in, too, Miss Hastings," he said with a merry twinkle. "You can get warmed at the fire." In twenty minutes they came out again, and the minister was putting a paper in his innermost pocket.

"Nice day after the storm," remarked Juan Valera as he chirruped to his horses.

"The most heavenly day I ever knew," responded the minister gravely.

"I can't say that," smiled Juan. "May day last was my most heavenly day, but another one is coming soon. I mean when June lays our child in my arms. You two don't know what a heavenly day is, for you haven't married June."

"What a cavalier speech," cried Maude gally, as she looked warningly at her husband. "I don't wonder you soon turned June's head. Is that the Western way?"

"The true Wyoming way," said Mr. Black significantly.

Maude was soon clasped in the arms of her friend, the happy mistress of Casa Alegre, and in a minute had sobbed out the fact she and Jonathan were married. "We met in the diner," she explained breathlessly and were married this morning."

"You certainly have us beaten to a frazzle," said Juan. "June kept me waiting from October till May. But it was worth it."

After the midday dinner June and her guest had a long visit and then came the hour of parting, for Jonathan insisted that they repair at once to his cabin. "You will take things as they are, sweetheart, won't you for old Maria doesn't know what I'm bringing home."

"I would rather have it so, dear. I walked right into your life and I want to walk right into your home the same way."

The adieux were said, the "God-speed yous" pronounced upon the happy pair, and June turned in to her home saying with a sigh. "If they weren't two such perfect jewels I'd be terribly frightened at the risk they run in this hasty marriage, but as it is—I just can't be. But, oh, I've lost my long expected guest," and she buried her head on her husband's shoulder.

"There, there, June, don't shed a tear. You've gained a steady neighbor, and think what is coming to live with us soon, soon."

The two travelers on horseback soon came in sight of the cabin, silhouetted against the brilliant evening sky. "It will be no longer my lonely cabin," Jonathan said, as he reined in his horse beside hers, "but my Cabin of Content."

"And you will find someone within to welcome you when your horse comes trudging home, St. Jonathan," she answered bravely.

"Thank God. With you there this little humble cabin will be,—is paradise. A paradise on earth. Come in sweet mate of mine." Then they kissed and he drew her to his heart in a passionate embrace. "A saint can love an earth maiden, can't he?" she murmured.

"I'll show you," was his reply.

Who Wins the Auto Gets the Cash to Run It Too

An extraordinary and attractive feature of our New Grand Prize Offer is that whoever wins the $635 Overland touring car will also receive a large sum in cash besides having the fully equipped auto delivered absolutely free of charge. The combination of seven sets of prizes together with cash commissions or premiums(as you choose) is such that, if you win the auto, you can't help winning at least one (in all probability several) of the large monthly cash prizes, too, which with your cash commissions will surely total a large sum. Besides the car we paid $360 in monthly cash prizes to the winner of the auto in last winter's contest.

CIVIL WAR BIBLE REACHES OWNER.—A well-worn Bible issued to troops in the Civil War and lost on the battlefield of Peachtree Creek, Georgia, on July [illegible] 1864, has been returned to its owner, Fred[illegible]ck C. Will of Oconomowoc, then first sergeant of Company B, by the finder, Geo. C. Stacey of the Sixty-fifth Ohio Regiment.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossiblt to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful one schosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

WHETHER I believe in telling children there is a Santa Claus or whether I do not, still remains a deep, dark mystery (I don't know as I've really decided anyway), but I do believe in a Christmas tree as do the majority of the readers. You say, "for the children," but, candidly, down deep, don't you enjoy it for yourself, too? But since it is for the children, let them help decorate it. The joy of helping will more than make up for any lack of surprise at seeing the completed tree. It's more fun to watch it grow, they will tell you.

Of course father or big brother will have to superintend the setting up of the tree as will mother, or some older person, have to direct the decorations and possibly help in the very hardest of it.

The practise of saving Christmas decorations from one year to another is a wise one, but the strings of pop corn and cranberries, as well as the bags of net, can be made by the little fingers. Then the stores offer so much in the way of decorations at such a small cost that a few can be added each year at a very trifling cost. Coarse salt melted and poured over the tree will give a good imitation of snow.

Sometimes tiny Chinese lanterns are considered safer for use on the tree than unprotected candles and it is well to prepare for a possible fire by having a tub of water handy and also a big rug or blanket, ready for instant use. However, don't alarm the children unnecessarily with these precautions, but only enough to insure moderate caution.

I like the old custom of placing Christmas candles in our windows. It is beautiful in its meaning that not only shall we make our own home bright but we shall shed light across the paths of others, for only thus do we get the real meaning of Christmas.—Ed.

TROY, S. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I wonder if you have room for a little, gray-eyed, brown-haired woman, only five feet tall and weighing one hundred and fifteen pounds, but with a heart full of love for all the readers of COMFORT and especially Uncle Charlie, Mr. Gannett and you, Mrs. Wilkinson.

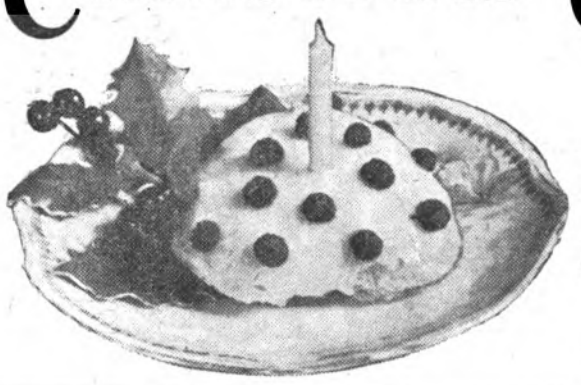
I will tell you about this part of South Carolina, as I see very few letters from here. Our principal money crop is cotton, which is at a paying price now, though we raise corn, wheat and oats and, in fact, anything grows here except strictly tropical plants and fruits. The timber is mostly pine and oak. The climate is healthful, on the whole, in this part of the state and to my mind the people are all one could ask for as neighbors. I might safely say every fifth family owns a car, their own home, and have a piano and telephone, and rural mail routes go by nearly all the homes, too. My own home, to which I came as a bride twenty years ago, has large oaks on either side of the road, a flower yard in front, with a six-room cottage, having a porch around the front and sides which looks cool and inviting with its vines and box flowers. I am a lover of flowers and have some very pretty ones and there is hardly a time in the year when I do not have some in bloom. We all love music and my husband, until a year or two before he died, played the violin. His violin is nearly a hundred years old and has a very sweet tone.

I hope you all won't think me too personal, but I always like to read the letters that make me feel in touch with the writers and somehow a glimpse of their homes and what they like and do makes me feel that way.

I see some are against large families and I am too. I think it wrong to bring helpless children into the world, without their consent or knowledge, and then not fit them properly for the conflicts of life, which is quite impossible in many cases where this world's goods are none too plentiful. I have children and am doing my best by them. I have a little savings account in the bank for each, for their very own, to add to every year. It is an incentive for them to save their money. If your boy or girl has only one dollar, put it in the bank for them in their name, and when the little new baby comes put in one dollar or five dollars, or whatever you can spare, for it and add to it as you can. Some day both you and they will be thankful.

Thanking each for the pleasure and help derived from their letters, I am, your South Carolina sister.

MRS. ADELE LOVELACE.



Mrs. Lovelace. Your idea of starting a bank account for each of your children is to be commended, and it brings to my mind a method I was reading about only a short time ago—that of depositing as many dollars in the bank on the child's birthday as it is years old. One dollar for first year, two dollars when two years old and so on till the child is of age. If one can, the amounts might be reversed and twenty-one dollars deposited on the child's first birthday, twenty dollars the second year, making a deposit of but one dollar on his twenty-first birthday. This isn't always so convenient but the interest counts up quicker. I'm not expert enough in mathematics to give you the total sum offhand, but it is worth trying for and will give your son or daughter a good start in life. Of course the money may be invested from time to time and thus earn even more.—Ed.

WASHINGTON.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

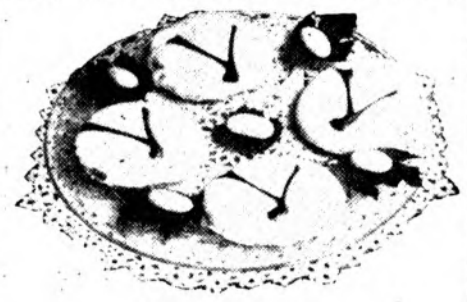
Having been a subscriber to COMFORT for many years I would like to air my views, though probably they'll land in the waste-basket. Have read many heated arguments on both sides of the Suffrage question and also heard able speakers on both sides, and the fact still remains that we are living and must live so let us make conditions as tolerable as we can while we are here.

CHRISTMAS CAKES AND HOLIDAY GOODIES

By Ella Gordon

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

GOOD things to eat holds a large place in our Christmas festivities and what to fill the home-made basket with that we send to friends and neighbors on that great day is always an open question. Perhaps one of the simplest and at the same time most attractive baskets is made from a quart strawberry box. First cover the outside with bright red crepe or plain tissue paper, letting the edges lap well onto the inside. Edge the top about an inch high with upright twigs of evergreen, carrying twine around to hold it in place. To cover twine and ends of evergreen, make a fold of the red paper, carry it around the basket and sew ends together and finish with a small red ribbon bow or a bunch of the evergreen. Line inside with white paper napkins, arranging neatly.



To fill, place in the center one apple filled with cider jelly and surround it with Christmas cakes and fill in the nitches with stuffed dates, brown sugar fudge and across the top a few raisins on the stem. And then that the box may carry some message of good will, neatly copy a verse from some Christmas carol, fold and tuck it in among the goodies.

Christmas Cakes

This cake mixture offers a foundation for almost an endless variety of cakes and if directions are carefully followed success will surely be yours.

Warm the mixing bowl with hot water and wipe dry. Put in one cup of butter and work with a spoon till creamy and light. Add one and one half cups of sugar and beat well into butter and then the beaten yolks of three eggs and the flavoring. Into three cups of twice sifted flour put one teaspoonful of cream of tartar and one half of soda and measure out one half cup of milk. Add to the butter, eggs and sugar a little milk and stir, then a little flour and continue until the milk and flour are used, then add the whites of three well-beaten eggs and beat all together till smooth. Bake in a moderate oven fifty minutes.

Where the above cake mixture is to be made into Christmas cakes, put a part of the dough into a shallow pan about half an inch thick and bake. When cold, with a sharp knife cut into diamond shapes two inches square. Have prepared a bowl of frosting and dip in each piece of cake so it will be frosted all over. An easy arrangement for drying the cakes is to rest a flat colander or old-fashioned wire sieve on a shallow baking pan and through the holes stand toothpicks and rest the cakes on these till the frosting is firm. Put cakes on a three-tined fork when dipping into frosting. If further decoration is desired, while frosting is still soft, press into the center of each cake a cube of firm jelly, a raisin or a nut. Another decoration is to color a spoonful of the white frosting with beet juice and drop a little on the center of each cake.

Very attractive for Christmas is to bake the cake in a long loaf and frost white. Make an ornamental frosting by beating the white of one egg very stiff, add two scant teaspoons of orange or lemon juice and a tablespoon of powdered sugar. Color with beet juice. Beat five minutes, add a little more sugar and beat again, and so on till frosting is firm enough to spread. Put frosting into a paper tunnel with a very small opening and trace the word Christmas across cake; or if the whole word is too great an undertaking, use Xmas.

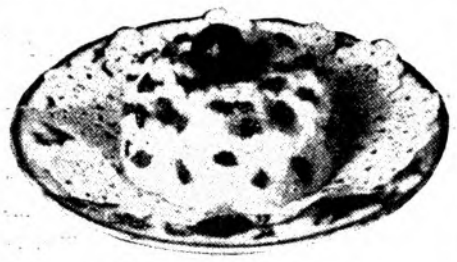
If a richer cake is desired, add to the above dough mixture half a cup of dates cut fine and floured, and a saltspoonful each of mace, cinnamon and allspice.

Recipes

BOILDED FROSTING.—Boil one cup of granulated sugar with one third cup of boiling water till it threads. Have ready the beaten white of one egg and in a fine stream pour over it the boiling syrup beating steadily, and while beating add one eighth of a teaspoon of cream of tartar, teaspoon of vanilla and a teaspoon of orange or lemon juice. Beat till firm but not too long as it hardens quickly.

WISH-BONE CAKES.—Cream together one half cup of butter with one cup of sugar and beat in two squares of grated chocolate or five teaspoons of cocoa, two well-beaten eggs, one tablespoon of milk and one cup and a half of flour mixed with two teaspoons of baking powder. Add flour enough to roll and cut into round cakes. Bake in quick oven about ten minutes. Frost white with boiled frosting and represent a wishbone on each cake with chocolate frosting.

CHOCOLATE FROSTING.—Beat yolks of one egg and stir in one and three quarters cup of pow red sugar and tree squares of melted chocolate and enough cream so it will spread. Flavor with vanilla.



CHRISTMAS PLUM PUDDING.—Three cups of soft grated bread, two cups of chopped suet, one cup of cleaned currants, two cups of seeded raisins and two thirds of a cup of citron shaved thin, one cup of sugar mixed with three even tablespoons of flour, half a teaspoon of salt and half a teaspoon of grated nutmeg and a little cinnamon. Mix together and add six well-beaten eggs and half a cup of either milk or brandy. Put into buttered mould, cover and steam four hours then remove from mould and bake half an hour in a moderately hot oven. Serve warm with hard sauce.

HARD SAUCE.—Cream one quarter of a cup of butter till very light and gradually work in two thirds of a cup of powdered sugar and a little nutmeg and grated orange rind.

CHRISTMAS COOKIES.—Cream together one half cup of butter with one cup of sugar; add one well-beaten egg, quarter of a cup of milk and two even teaspoons of baking powder, sifted with a cup of flour, and then enough more flour to handle. If the dough is put where it will chill for two hours, it can be handled with less flour stirred in and the cookies will be much nicer. Frost with marshmallow frosting.

FROSTING.—Put one half pound of marshmallows to melt in a double boiler. Boil one cup of sugar with one third cup of boiling water till it threads when tested with a spoon. Pour in a fine stream onto the beaten white of one egg and add to this the marshmallows and a teaspoon of vanilla. Beat till it will spread on cookies. Decorate with narrow strips of citron and red cubes of jelly. Arrange on plate with twigs of evergreen between cookies.

CHRISTMAS GRAHAM PUDDING.—Beat together one cup of molasses, one half cup of milk, two well-beaten eggs and half a teaspoon of soda. Add teaspoon of cinnamon and a pinch each of nutmeg and ginger and one and one half cups of sifted graham flour, two tablespoons of melted butter and one cup of seeded raisins. Steam three hours and bake one hour in a closely covered pail or can, anly filling two thirds full. Butter and flour can thoroughly.

CREAM SAUCE.—Beat the yolk of one egg and work in one cup of powdered sugar and one teaspoon of vanilla and then the beaten white of egg. When ready to serve, beat in one pint of partly whipped cream.

CIDER JELLY IN APPLES.—Soak a box of gelatine in one cup of cold water ten minutes and then dissolve in a double cooker. Into one and one half quarts of cider put one large cup of sugar and if the cider is quite new add the juice of two lemons. When the gelatine is hot and melted, add the cider and set away to harden. Cut the top from large red apples, scoop out the pulp till the walls are about half an inch thick and fill with the jelly and replace the top of apple. Serve very cold.

STUFFED DATES.—Select choice dates and pour boiling water over them and let stand one minute. Wipe and cut a slit in the side large enough to slip out the stone, and in its place press one quarter of a walnut or chopped peanuts. Press together and roll in powdered sugar.

BROWN SUGAR FUDGE.—Boil two cups of brown sugar, one cup of white sugar and one half cup of sour cream till it will form a ball in cold water, then add butter size of a walnut and one teaspoon of water and beat till it thickens a little. Pour into a buttered tin and when partly cold cut into squares. Chopped nuts may be added.

Rules for Cake Making

Have fire ready before beginning to make cake.

Have each ingredient measured, earthen mixing bowl, egg beaters, spoons and tins ready before beginning to mix cake.

Be careful not to break yolk when separating from white as a very little of the yolk in the white will prevent the white from beating dry. A satisfactory way is to gently break the shell on the edge of a cup, then separate enough for the white to drain out, leaving the yolk in a half shell. Only fresh eggs will make good cake.

Coarse granulated sugar makes heavy cake.

In making butter cake, alternate the milk and flour, stirring between each addition, then beat all together till smooth.

Cream of tartar, soda and baking powder should be added to flour and sifted again.

Spoon dry ingredients (such as flour, meal and sugar) into measure, as dipping with measure forces in more than a measure full.

Use pastry flour for cake making.

In making sponge cake, after the eggs, sugar and liquid have been put together, beat with an egg beater three minutes and the texture of cake will be greatly improved. Always add flour and then the beaten whites of eggs last to sponge cake.

Thin cakes require a hotter oven than when baked in loaves.

Butter cakes require a moderate oven and during the first half of baking should only rise and begin to brown. When nearly done the cake will begin to shrink from the pan and settle.

Never move cake before it begins to brown or is two thirds done, and then very gently, being careful that cold air does not strike it.

Molasses cake burns on the bottom very quickly, and to prevent this, use paper and a sprinkling of flour in bottom of tin.

Sudden changes in heat of oven will make cake heavy, so be sure the fire is under control and will last during the baking.

One Thing Worth Knowing

Pie is all right and heavy puddings are all right when the rest of the meal is not so heavy as to tax digestion. But at certain times—once a week at least in every home—a lighter dessert of ought to be served.

On Sundays especially, when the housewife must get up the big dinners which the men folks want, it is becoming customary to make the dessert of Jell-O. It is so much easier and saves so much time—and is so good.

In every Jell-O package there is a little folder containing rules, suggestions and recipes for making up Jell-O in all possible forms.

There are seven flavors of Jell-O: Strawberry, Raspberry, Lemon, Orange, Cherry, Chocolate, Peach. Each 10 cents at any grocer's or any general store.

The flavors are pure fruit flavors, and the full strength of the flavors is preserved by the air-tight and moisture proof waxed paper Safety Bags enclosing the Jell-O inside the cartons.

The price has never changed. It is ten cents to-day just as it has been from the beginning.

Washington has Suffrage and the women do not quarrel or argue on the streets but go quietly to the polls and vote, many in company of their husbands. Now you Antis, do you always stay at home? Don't you ever attend lodge, teas, clubs? Do you always tat when you have nothing else on hand? If so, I advise you, one and all, to send to the U. S. Bureau of Labor, Washington, D. C. and get statistics on the condition of working women and children. I think it will open your eyes and give you food for thought. Also you will realize that we suffragettes are not so wrong after all. Don't be selfish, but think of the women who are bread earners. Then if you do not wish to vote, why well and good. As far as the indecent element is concerned, you rub elbows with them nearly every day of your life, you can't help it for you go down town shopping as well as they and as for standing in line with them at the polls, I am willing to stand all day, and so will all other good women, in order to vote for the right, for there are more good women who will vote than bad ones. Did you ever think of that? I think that Uncle Sam did a very wise thing when he separated politics and religion so why try to mix them? Our religion is sacred and it has nothing to do with politics, and the Suffrage cause will suffer only by people becoming angry, for we can vote and yet be Christians.

There seems to be much disagreement about the war. We, husband and I, never quarrel about it though one is of English and the other of German descent, for we are Americans and loyal to the Stars and Stripes. Let Europe settle her own difficulties, but one must think with sorrow of the heart-breaking cruelty on all sides, and with compassion for the widows and orphans and of the useless and needless slaughter of human beings.

And now sisters, I had an able woman, well versed in law, tell me that Woman Suffrage and political equality were one and the same thing. I hold that under the existing law we cannot have political

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Edith Allandale, the only support of an invalid mother pawns a valuable watch. To redeem it she offers a five-dollar gold piece, paid to her by Royal Bryant, to the broker, who, dropping it into the drawer declares it a counterfeit and returns it. Going home her mother suggests it may be genuine and again Edith goes out to buy food and coal. While eating supper an officer enters, followed by the grocer who insists upon Edith's arrest for passing counterfeit money. Mrs. Allendale unnerved, faints away, and Edith protesting her innocence, is hurried to the station house, leaving her mother in the care of Kate O'Brien. Edith writes to Royal Bryant explaining the situation.

CHAPTER V.

A MOTHER'S LAST REQUEST.

TWO hours later, Royal Bryant was at the pawnbroker's shop, and had redeemed Edith's watch, much against the wish of the money-lender, who desired to retain it. And as the lawyer placed the watch in his pocket, he made a sign to an officer on the street, who had accompanied him to the spot.

Solon Retz was astounded when he found himself a prisoner, on the charge of passing counterfeit money. He was hurried to court, and the judge investigated the case at once. Mr. Bryant and Mr. Knowles gave their testimony, and it was conclusively demonstrated that the spurious coin must have come from the pawnbroker's drawer.

At Royal Bryant's suggestion the pawnbroker was ordered to be searched, when no less than three more bogus pieces were found concealed upon his person.

This was deemed sufficient proof of his guilt, without further testimony, and he was sentenced to four years' imprisonment, without Edith having been called to the witness stand to testify against him.

As the crest-fallen pawnbroker was led away, Royal Bryant went eagerly to Edith's side.

"You are free, Miss Allandale," he exclaimed, with a radiant face, "and I think we are to be congratulated upon having made such quick work of the case."

"It is all owing to your cleverness," Edith returned, lifting a pair of grateful eyes to his face. "How can I thank you?"

"You do not need to do that, for I feel that I alone have been to blame for all your trouble," he said, in a self-reproachful tone; then he added, with a roguish gleam in his fine eyes: "I shall never be guilty of paying my copyist in gold again. Now come, I have a carriage waiting for you and will send you directly home to your mother," the young man concluded, as he lifted her shawl from the chair where she had been sitting and wrapped it about her shoulders.

Edith followed him to the street, where a hack stood ready to take her home.

Mr. Bryant assisted her to enter it, when he laid a small package in her lap.

"It is your watch," he said, in a low tone. Then, extending his hand to her, he added: "I shall not ask you to return to the office for two or three days—you need rest after your recent anxiety and excitement, while I am to be away until Wednesday noon. Come to me on Thursday morning, if you feel able, when I shall have plenty of work for you."

He pressed the hand he was holding with an unconscious fondness which brought a rich color into the young girl's face, then, closing the carriage door, he gave the order to the coachman, smiled another adieu, as he lifted his hat to her, and the next moment Edith was driven away.

There was a glad light in her eyes, a tender smile on her red lips, and, in spite of her poverty and many cares, she was, for the moment, thrilled to her very soul by the consciousness that Royal Bryant loved her.

She sat thus, in happy reverie, until the carriage turned into the street where she lived; then, suddenly coming to herself, her attention was again attracted to the package in her lap.

"There is something besides mamma's watch here!" she murmured, as she noticed the thickness of it.

Untying the string and removing the wrapper, she found a pretty purse with a silver clasp lying upon the case containing the watch.

With burning cheeks she opened it, and found within a crisp ten-dollar note and Royal Bryant's card bearing these words upon the back:

"I shall deem it a favor if you will accept the inclosed amount, as a loan, until you find yourself in more comfortable circumstances financially. Yours, R. B."

Edith caught the purse to her lips with a thrill of joy.

"How kind! how delicate!" she murmured. "He knew that I was nearly penniless—that I had almost nothing with which to tide over the next few days, during his absence. He is a prince—he is a king among men, and I——"

A vivid flush dyed her cheeks as she suddenly checked the confession that had almost escaped her lips.

The carriage stopped at last before the door of her home—if the miserable tenement-house could be designated by such a name—and she sprang eagerly to the ground as the coachman opened the door for her to alight.

"The fare is all paid, miss," he said, respectfully, as she hesitated a moment; then she went bounding up the stairs to be met on the threshold of her room by Kate O'Brien—who had seen the carriage stop—with her finger on her lips and a look in her kind, honest eyes that made the girl's heart sink with a sudden shock.

"My mother!" she breathed, with paling lips.

"Whisht, mavourneen!" said the woman, pitifully; then added, in a lower tone: "She has been mortal ill, miss."

"And now?" panted Edith.

"Sh! She is asleep."

Edith waited to hear no more. She pushed by the woman, entered the room, and gliding swiftly but noiselessly to the bed, looked down upon the scarcely breathing figure lying there.

It was with difficulty that she repressed a shriek of agony at what she saw, for the shadow of death was unmistakably settling over the beloved face.

The invalid stirred slightly upon her pillow as Edith came to her side and bent over her.

"My darling," she murmured weakly, as her white lids fluttered open, and she bent a look full of love upon the fair face above her, "I—am going——"

"No, no, mamma!" whispered the heart-broken girl.

"Bring me the—Japanese box—quick!" the dying woman commanded, in a scarcely audible tone.

Without a word Edith darted to a closet, opened a trunk, and from its depths drew forth a beautiful casket inlaid with mother-of-pearl and otherwise exquisitely decorated.

"The—key," gasped the sick one, fumbling feebly among the folds of her night-robe.

Edith bent over her and unfastened a key from a golden chain which encircled her mother's neck.

"Open!" she whispered, glancing toward the casket.

The girl, wondering, but awed and silent, unlocked the box and threw back the cover, thus revealing several packages of letters and other papers neatly arranged within it.

Mrs. Allandale reached forth a weak and bloodless hand, as if to take something out of the box, when she suddenly choked, and in another instant the red life-current was flowing from her lips.

"Letters—burn——" she gasped, with a last expiring effort, and then became suddenly insensible.

In an agony of terror, Edith dashed the box upon the nearest chair and began to chafe the cold hand that hung over the side of the bed, while Mrs. O'Brien came forward, a look of awe on her face.

The frail chest of the invalid heaved two or three times, there was a spasmodic twitching of the slender fingers lying on the young girl's hand, then all was still, and Edith Allandale was motherless.

CHAPTER VI.

A HERITAGE OF SHAME.

We will not linger over the sad details of the ceremonies attending Mrs. Allandale's burial. Suffice it to say that on Tuesday afternoon her remains were borne away to Greenwood, and laid to rest, in the family lot, beside those gone before, after which Edith returned to her desolate abode more wretched than it is possible to describe.

She had made up her mind, however, that she could not remain there any longer—that she must find a place for herself in a different locality and among a different class of people. This she knew she could do, since she had the promise of permanent work and now had only herself to care for.

The change, too, must be made upon the following day, as Mr. Bryant would expect her at his office on Thursday morning.

There was much to be done, many things to be packed for removal, while what she did not care to retain must be disposed off; and, eager to forget her grief and loneliness—for she knew she would be ill if she sat tamely down and allowed herself to think—she began at once, upon her return from the cemetery to get ready to leave the cheerless home where she had suffered so much.

She decided, first of all, to pack all wearing apparel; and, on going to her closet to begin her work, the first thing her eyes fell upon was the casket of letters, which her mother had requested her to bring to her just before she died.

The sight of this unnerved her again, and, with a moan of pain, she sank upon her knees and bowed her head upon it.

But the fountain of her tears had been so exhausted that she could not weep; and, finally becoming somewhat composed, she took the beautiful box out into the room and sat down near a light to examine its contents.

"Mamma evidently wanted these letters destroyed," she murmured, as she threw back the cover. "I will do as she wished, but I will first look them over, to be sure there is nothing of value among them."

She set about her task at once and found that they were mostly missives from intimate friends, with quite a number written by herself to her mother, while she was away at boarding school.

All these she burned after glancing casually at them. Nothing then remained in the box but a small package of six or eight time-yellowed epistles bound together with a blue ribbon.

"What peculiar writing!" Edith observed, as she separated one from the others and examined the superscription upon the envelop. "Why, it is postmarked Rome, Italy, away back in 18—, and addressed to mamma in London! That must have been when she was on her wedding tour!"

Her curiosity was aroused, and, drawing the closely written sheet from its inclosure, she began to read it.

It was also dated from Rome, and the girl was soon deeply immersed in a story of intense and romantic interest.

She readily understood that the letter had been written by a dear friend of Mrs. Allandale's youth—one who had been both school and roommate, and who unreservedly confided all her secrets and experiences to her bosom companion. And yet, it was strange, Edith thought, that she had never heard her mother speak of this friend.

It seemed that there had been quite an interval in their correspondence, for the writer spoke of the surprise which her friend would experience upon receiving a letter from her from that locality, when she had probably believed her to be in her own home, living the quiet life of a dutiful daughter.

Then it spoke of an "ideal love" that "had come to beautify her life;" of a noble and wealthy artist who had won her heart, but who, for some unaccountable reason, had not been acceptable to her parents, and they had sternly rejected his proposal for her hand.

Next came the denouement, which told that the girl had eloped with her lover and flown with him to Italy.

"I suppose it was not the right thing to do, darling," the missive ran; "but papa, you know, is a very austere, relentless man, and when he has once made up his mind, there is no hope of ever turning him; so I have taken my fate into my own hands—or, rather, I have given it into the keeping of my dear one, and we are so happy, Edith darling, and lead an ideal life in this quaint old city of the seven hills, at whose feet runs, like a thread of gold, the yellow Tiber. My husband is everything to me—so noble, so kind, so generous; it is so very strange that papa could not like him—that is the only drop of bitterness in my overflowing cup of happiness."

There was much more of the same tenor, from which it is not necessary to quote; and, after reading the letter through, Edith took up another, interested to know how the pretty love-story of her mother's friend would terminate. The second one, written a month later, was more subdued, but not less tender, although the young girl thought she detected a vein of sadness running through it.

The next two or three mentioned the fact that the writer was left much alone, her "dear one" being obliged to be away a great deal of the time, upon sketching expeditions, etc.

After an interval of three months another letter spoke in the fondest manner of the "dear little stranger," that had come to bless and cheer her loneliness—"lonely, dear Edith, because my husband's art monopolizes his time, while he is often absent from home a week at a time in connection with it, and I do not know what I should do, in this strange country away from all my friends, if it were not for my precious baby girl whom I have named for you, as I promised, in memory of those happy days which we spent together at Vassar."

"Then mamma's friend had a daughter, who was also named Edith," mused our fair heroine, breaking in upon her perusal of the letter. "I wonder if she is living, and where? Those letters tell me nothing, give no last name by which to identify either the writer or her husband."

She turned back to the epistle, and read on:

"She is such a comfort to me," it ran, "and gives me an object in life—something besides myself and my trou"—these last three words were crossed out—"to think about. When will you come to Rome, dear Edith? Your last letter was dated from St. Petersburg. I am very anxious that you should see your little namesake, and make me that long-promised visit."

There was only one more letter in the package, and Edith's face was very grave and sympathetic as she drew it from its envelope.

"I am sure that her husband proved to be negligent of and unkind to her," she murmured, "and that she repented her rashness in leaving her home and friends. Oh, I wonder why girls will be so foolish as to go directly contrary to the advice of those who love them best, and run away with men of whom they know comparatively nothing!"

With a sigh of regret for the unfortunate wife, of whom she had been reading, she unfolded the letter in her hands and began to read, little dreaming what strange things she was to learn from it.

"Oh, Edith darling," it began, "how can I tell you?—how can I write of the terrible calamity that has overtaken me? My heart is broken—my life is ruined, and all because I would not heed those who loved me, and who, I now realize, were my best and kindest counselors. I could bear it for myself, perhaps—I could feel that it was but a just judgment upon me for my obstinacy and unfilial conduct, and so drag out my weary existence in submission to the inevitable; but when I think of my innocent babe—my lovely Edith—your namesake! oh! I would never have had her christened thus, I could not have insulted you so, had I known! I feel almost inclined to doubt the justice and love of God—if, indeed, there is a God."

The letter here looked as if the writer must have been overcome with her wretchedness, and wept tears of bitter despair, for it was badly blurred and defaced.

But Edith, her face now absolutely colorless, read eagerly on.

"I cannot bear it and live," the writer resumed, "and so—I am going to—die. Edith, my husband—no, my betrayer, I ought rather to say—has deserted me! He has gone to Florence with a beautiful Italian countess, who is also very rich, and is living with her there in her elegant palace, just outside the city. He has long been attentive to her, but I never dreamed how far matters had gone until yesterday, when I came upon them, unawares, in Everard's studio, and heard him tell her how he loved her—that 'I was not his wife, only his——' I cannot write the vile word that makes my flesh creep with horror. Then I learned of his base conduct to me, whom, as he expressed it, he 'had cleverly deceived, and coaxed to run away with him to while away his solitude during his sojourn in a strange country.' It is a wonder that I did not drop dead where I stood—slain by the dreadful truth; but the wicked lovers did not dream of being overheard, and so I listened to the whole of their vile plot and then stole away to try and decide upon a course of action. When Everard came home, I charged him with his perfidy. Then—pity me, Edith—he boldly told me that he was weary of me; that he would pay me a handsome sum of money and I might take my child and go back to my parents! Oh! I cannot go into details, or tell you what I have suffered—no one will ever know that but God! Why, oh, why does He permit such evil to exist? He does not—there is no God! there is no God!"

There was a huge blot here, as if the pen had fallen from the fingers that had dared to deny the existence of Deity; then the missive was resumed in a different tone, as if a long interval of thought had intervened.

"Edith, I am calmer now, and I am going to ask a great favor of you. You are happily married, you have a noble husband and abundant means, and you know we once pledged ourselves to befriend each other, if either should ever find herself in trouble. Presuming upon that pledge, I am going to ask if you will take my darling, my poor innocent little waif, bring her up as your own, and never let her know anything about the stain that rests upon her birth? She is pure; she is not to blame for the sins of her parents, and I cannot bear the thought of her growing up to learn of her heritage of shame, as she would be sure to do if I should live and rear her as my child. Your last letter tells me that you will be in Rome in less than a fortnight. I cannot meet you—I can never again meet any one whom I have known; and so, Edith—I am going to die. I give my child to you—I believe you will not refuse my last request—and you will find her, with the woman who nursed me when she was born, at No. 2 Via del Vecchia. The woman has my instructions—she believes that I am only going away on a little trip with my husband; but you will show her this letter, and prove to her that you have authority to take the child away. When you go home, you will take her with you, as your own, and no one need ever know that she is not your own. Do not ever reveal the truth to her: let her grow up happy and care-free, like other girls who are of honorable birth; and if the dead can watch over and shield the living, you and yours shall be so shielded and watched over by your lost but still loving,

BELLE."

"She was my mother! I am that child of shame,' came hoarsely from Edith's bloodless lips as she finished reading that dreadful letter.

Then the paper slipped from her nerveless fingers, her head dropped unconsciously upon the table before her, and she knew nothing more until long afterward, when she awoke from her swoon to find her lamp gone out and the room growing cold, while her heart felt as if it had been paralyzed in her bosom.

CHAPTER VII.

TWO NEW ACQUAINTANCES.

Edith, when consciousness returned, had not a doubt that the letters, which she had been reading, had been penned by the hand of her own mother; that she was that little baby who had been born in Rome—that child of shame whose father had so heartlessly deserted it; whose mother, her brain turned by her suffering and wrongs, had planned to take her own life, rather than live to taint her little one's future with the shadow of her own disgrace.

The knowledge of this seemed to blight, as with a lightning flash, every hope of her life.

She groped her way to the bed, for she was becoming benumbed with the cold, and threw herself upon it, utterly wretched, utterly hopeless. For hours she lay there in a sort of stupor, conscious only of one terrible fact—her shame—her ruined life!

"Oh, I had begun to hope that——" she began, then abruptly ceased, a burning flush suffusing her face as her thoughts thus went out toward Royal Bryant, whose eyes had only the day before told her, as plainly as eyes could speak, that he loved her, while her heart had thrilled with secret joy over the revelation, and the knowledge that her own affection had been irrevocably given to him, even though they had known each other so short a time.

Even in the midst of her sorrow over her dead, the thought that she loved and was beloved had been like the strains of soothing music to her, and she had looked forward to her return to the young lawyer's office as to a place of refuge, where she would meet with kindness and sympathy that would comfort her immeasurably.

But these beautiful dreams had been ruthlessly shattered; she could never be anything to Royal Bryant—he could never be anything to her, after learning what she had learned that night.

Edith determined to leave New York at once. With this object in view, she disposed of most of her furniture to a broker, who gave her sixty dollars for it. She reserved articles she presented to her stanch friend, Kate O'Brien. These matters attended to, she wrote a letter to Mr. Bryant, mailed it, and a few hours later was on the train, en route to Boston.

On Thursday morning Mr. Bryant, returning to town from a business trip, cheerfully entered his office, expecting to behold there the radiant face of Edith. To his great disappointment, she

The BEST COOKING FRUIT

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

IT is no new idea that fruit eating is a promoter of good health, and that the apple should be considered in the light of a valued friend. Our family physicians have advocated it ever since we can remember.

As each case is individual, everyone should make a study of their own stomach in regard to fruit eating that the best results may be obtained. Fruit taken before other food in the morning often acts as a corrective of headaches, biliousness and constipation, the headaches often being but a symptom of indigestion which causes many ailments. An entire breakfast of fruit, either cooked or uncooked, has relieved many a sufferer. People with acid stomachs would do well to take fruit at the end of a meal, as the food dilutes the acid which is liable to cause a stomach ache if taken first into an acid stomach. One teaspoonful of finely scraped slightly tart apple is excellent for babies after six months of age, if taken between meals, at least one hour after being fed with milk. Apples make the best kind of a school lunch for children, helping to overcome the ill effects of too much starch and sugar which children so delight in. Substituting apples for desserts a part of the time, while apples are so delicious will be found very beneficial to the system.

Dried apples may be made into delicious pies, turnovers and sauces if properly prepared. It is well to remember that only the water has been dried out of the apple; that the solids remain. To cook, very quickly wash in cold water, drain and add enough more water to hardly cover, and let soak not more than two hours, occasionally turning the apple over in the water. Now bring slowly to a boil and simmer till done and the water cooked down. If for pies, have the apple about two thirds done and finish cooking in the crust. The best kind of dried apple pie is made with an undercrust and the top with strips of crust instead of covering the whole pie. Apple pies should be cooked one hour whether made of fresh or dried apple. The oven should be hot when pies are first put in, and the heat decreased after ten minutes, and then cook very slowly. The crust will be tender and the apple a rich red and of a jellied consistency to say nothing of being more digestible.

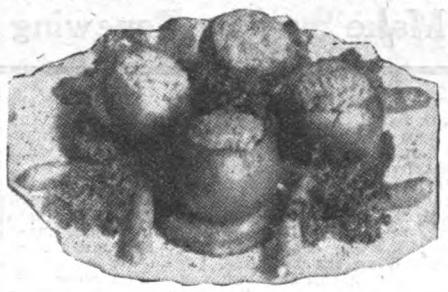
Sweet apples are best when put whole into a deep earthen bowl, a very little sugar added and a cup of water, covered tightly and baked very slowly till soft and slightly shrunken. Always cook apples in earthen or agate ware as the action of the acid on tin or iron is unwholesome. Roast po k is more digestible if served with apple sauce.

APPLE TAPIOCA.—Prepare tapioca according to the kind used. If the whole is used, to three quarters of a cup, add one quart of boiling water and cook till transparent in a double boiler. Core and pare six tart apples, put in a deep earthen baking dish, fill the cavities with sugar and pour the hot tapioca over them. Bake till apples are soft. Serve with sugar and cream.

APPLE TEA CAKE.—Rub together two cups of flour, one half teaspoon of soda, one teaspoon of cream of tartar, half a teaspoon of salt and three tablespoons of butter. Beat light one egg, add little less than one cup of milk and stir into flour. Spread less than an inch thick on a shallow pan. Pare and core and cut tart apples into eighths and lay close together in rows on top of dough, pressing slightly into cake. Sprinkle with sugar and a little cinnamon may be added. Bake in hot oven till apple is thoroughly cooked and brown. Serve with butter. This cake makes a nice pudding when served with hot maple syrup or sauce flavored with fruit juice.

APPLES IN JELLY.—Core tart apples, fill cavities with sugar, put a little water in pan and bake in a hot oven till very soft and dish onto a deep plate. Cover cores with cold water and boil while apples are baking. Strain and sweeten and add to baked apple juice and when boiling add a little gelatine that has been soaked in cold water. Pour over baked apples and set away to stiffen.

APPLE FLUFF.—Wash but do not peel or core four tart apples. Cut into small pieces and stew in a little water till the apple can be put through a fine wire strainer. Beat stiff the whites of four eggs and add gradually one cup of powdered sugar. Add the apple and beat till light. Serve at once with boiled custard.



CUSTARD.—Bring two cups of milk to boil in a double cooker. Beat the yolks of three eggs and gradually add three tablespoons of sugar. Pour over the boiling milk, beat together and return to cooker and stir till custard thickens. Three or four minutes is sufficient if the milk has not cooled too much, as the custard thickens as it cools, and if cooked too long will curdle. Soft custard is best when made the day before using. Flavor just before serving.

PAN DOWDY.—In an earthern baking dish put tart apples that have been peeled, cored and quartered. Cover with sugar, a little molasses, a piece of butter, a pinch each of cinnamon and salt and a little lemon extract. Cover with pie crust quarter of an inch thick and put in a hot oven, reducing the heat and baking slowly one hour and a half.

APPLE RINGS.—Fry or bake sausage meat, break slightly with a fork and pile in center of platter. Select large tart apples and core, but do not peel. Slice half an inch thick and fry in sausage fat. While frying sprinkle with a little sugar and cinnamon. Lap one ring onto another around edge of platter. Serve hot with baked potatoes.

HOME MADE SAUSAGE WITH BAKED APPLE.—Sausages should be made at home to insure a wholesome dish as well as a much more palatable one. Of sweet fresh pork use one third fat and two thirds lean, and put through your meat grinder or chop fine. For seasoning use one teaspoonful of sifted sage a very scant half teaspoon of white pepper, and one even tablespoon of salt to each pound of sausage meat. The best method for shaping sausages is to stuff cotton bags, made fifteen inches long and four inches wide. Before filling dip bags in strong salt and water and dry. Press sausage meat into bags with a wooden pestle. To use, turn back the end of bag, cut into slices three quarters of an inch thick and fry or bake to a rich brown.

An attractive dish can be made by baking good-sized tart apples whole, and when done scoop out about half the inside and fill with hot cooked sausage meat. Serve on round slices of toasted brown bread, garnish with sausages and parsley.

COMPOTE OF APPLES.—Make a syrup of two cups of water and one and one half cup of sugar. Simmer fifteen minutes and drop in ten tart apples that have been pared and cored. Cook slowly till soft way through and turn often in the syrup. (A richer syrup will be obtained by putting the apple peels and cores into a dish by themselves, cover with water and cook till apples are done and then strain and add liquid to syrup.) When done place apples on a plate and bake ten minutes in a hot oven. Arrange apples on platter and fill centers with preserve, or prunes and raisins cooked together to the consistency of marmalade. Boil down the syrup till it jellies and pour over the apples. Just before serving heap the top of apples with whipped cream.

APPLE-CUSTARD PIE.—Scrape two slightly tart apples, add scant cup of sugar, a pinch of cinnamon, two beaten eggs and one cup of fresh sweet milk. Bake in under crust.

MOSSBACK.

INDIANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I know some of you will be surprised at a bride of just one month having time for letters and will want to know how it happens. Frank—not John—and I are each twenty-five years old, not a bit handsome and each knows that the other hasn't any angel wings sprouting, but we think we'll pull though all right. I have always been a "Martha" and Frank has always been hardworking and economical. We had to be for in our homes there were many children and very little time and money for anything but the work of providing for all. I'm not sorry, that I've known Martha's cares for it makes my work easier now. Besides, the world couldn't do without its Marthas—surely Mrs. McKnight admits this, even while contrasting her a wee bit scornfully with Mary. But when we married we decided that our new life must have time for something better than sordid cares so we arranged for it by keeping out of debt. We haven't one new piece of store furniture in our four-room house? Some is second-hand, varnished, and my kitchen cabinet, sideboard, corner cupboard, dining table and dresser were all made of dry-goods boxes, etc., by Frank himself and I painted, varnished and otherwise spruced them up. Cheap, but neat and really good to look at—and we don't have to think of a furniture bill unpaid. Meanwhile, our farm is free from debt and we'll get the store furniture later, a piece at a time, when we can easily afford it. Besides that, I made every rug in the house, braided and crocheted them, little and big. And during the summer I put up and dried plums, peaches, apples, corn, beans, etc. People sometimes let their produce waste or neglect buying it while plenty and cheap and then in winter pay high prices for the same stuff shipped in from California.

Thanks to our Martha training, we now have time and some means for interests outside of our home. Last evening we made a list of papers and magazines we want and COMFORT headed the list. It is practical and helpful in so many ways and we both love Uncle Charlie and will now have time to get better acquainted with him. We enclose some other subscriptions with ours for the Home Fund and will try to send more later. We sympathize with the sisters in rallying to the defense of Saint Paul, but we wonder, would they, if Paul were now alive and an invalid, let him live in a rent, without thereon to lay his head and with no home of his own? For my part, I am in for rallying to our love-labor of buying a home for that afflicted, living "Good Man," our own dear Uncle Charlie!

Mrs. Wilkinson, I wish you could see my home-made dining-room this minute! It is a sunny room, there are flowers on the table, and a glass prism (Frank's work) in the window breaks the common light of day into the loveliest pieces of rainbow on walls and floor.

With best wishes to all, Your COMFORT SISTER.

Welcome "COMFORT Sister" and if my years would permit and I possessed the proper sylphlike figure for the task, I'd make a humble obeisance to you, little bride, with the wisdom of ages in your pretty head. How do I know you are pretty? Maybe "Frank" told me but whether he did or not I want to congratulate both you young people on having each other. There is no need for you to seek for the pot of gold at the foot of the rainbow, for you seem to have found it.—Ed.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE HOUR OF VENGEANCE.

MRS. De Burgh lay alone in her gorgeous bedroom, her glittering black eyes full of complacency. With Richard's daughter safely imprisoned up-stairs it would go hard if he were not entrapped, and once Hugo's hand was on him, it would not lie lightly.

The cripple smiled as she thought how the true owner of Castle De Burgh had been so long unsuspected in their very house; yet her smile was not quite easy.

"She's better stuff than Moyra"—her forehead wrinkling—"but, bah! she's all the more dangerous!"

And her uncanny smile came back as she thought how a very few days more in the tower room would make Richard's daughter give in to any terms.

Voices came low and muffled from Gilbert's room; but the invalid heard them without curiosity. She did not even wish to be near her "ventilator." Hugo had scoffed at it that very afternoon as a useless toy.

"That's only because I never told you of it," she had retorted. "Toy or no toy, I know through it what went on in the house when you were away amusing yourself!"

"Hugo!" she said quickly. Strangely enough, as her thoughts ran on her "ventilator," it seemed to her that she heard some one open it. "Hugo!" Her voice returned to her from the empty rooms.

A bell-rope lay on the bed, and with a chill of superstitious fear the invalid moved her clawlike hand to press it.

This silence, this loneliness, were somehow terrifying. Matthews must come at once!

As she fumbled for the cord, something made her raise her eyes.

In very terror of death, she dropped the bell-rope that might have saved her; panic-stricken, helpless, she screamed, her voice hoarse and wild, as a woman's in torture.

For the hour of vengeance was on her!

Undreaded, unsuspected, it had come. And Alicia de Burgh must face it alone, with no one to stand beween her and the hand of Heaven.

Was it a ghost or a living man who stood looking at her from the doorway into the sitting-room? Pale, stern, aged by far more than the score of years that had passed since she looked upon his face, Richard de Burgh confronted her! The figure that had been so straight and tall was bowed a little; the eyes—Alicia shuddering, saw the same look of scorn that had been in those eyes the day that she, Alicia Loyd, had fallen at this man's feet and told him she loved him beyond all the world. They had been pitiless then, as he raised her and put her away from him. They were more pitiless now, since she had revenged herself on him by ruining his life.

Was it in vain that she had married his father, ousted Richard, tricked him into a living grave? It must be, since he had escaped from it in spite of her; for this was no ghost, but the man himself.

Cold drops of terror stood on her forehead; her lips tried vainly to form an articulate word. Richard de Burgh dropped the curtain he had been holding aside.

"It is I, Alicia!" The voice she had not heard for years, except in her dreams, was merciless.

With incredible quickness he was beside her and had put the bell-rope far from her enfeebled grasp.

"Hugo!" Her voice broke as she tried to call.

"He has gone out! It is useless to call him." He drew a chair close to her. "Listen!" he said, "I came to this house tonight, partly to see you, partly for another reason! I met no one; I came straight to your sitting-room, but it was empty. As I stood, looking round it, I heard someone coming, and I went into the conservatory quickly—as you did the night my father died."

Fascinated, she lay staring at him, and in dull silence let him go on.

"I watched from the dark conservatory—as you did! I saw Hugo come in and open a door in the wall. It showed nothing but another wall, yet I heard plainly, as if I were in the next room, my own name, in Gilbert's voice—'Richard told me, this afternoon at Glen Farm,' he said."

"You saw Gilbert!" her scorn and hatred of her younger son leaped out even now. "He knew where you were? Oh! the senseless traitor!"

"Stop and hear me out!" sternly. "It is not for you to call any one traitor. What were you, when you fastened your crime on my head; when you killed the old man whose only sin was that his love wearied you?" His voice rose a little, and she shuddered.

Behind the hangings Jocelyn gripped Huntley's arm.

"You hear?" she whispered. He nodded, stupefied. He waited for a denial from Mrs. De Burgh, but she only gasped for breath, her head rolling from side to side on her satin pillow.

"'Richard told me at Glen Farm,'" the man repeated. "That was what Hugo heard as well as I, for he turned away from that shallow recess and hurried out. You must have heard him, for you called his name. He was gone, though; no one heard you but I. And now you may call him as much as you like; but this time he is half way to Glen Farm, looking for me."

"How dare you come here?" she broke out fiercely. "Hugo may be gone, but do you think the servants will not come if I call? What will you do then, a lunatic, a condemned criminal, found threatening a helpless cripple?"

"I have not yet threatened you, Alicia," his hard voice quieted her with a new terror. "But I do not mean to let you call. And do you think I have forgotten your ways? Your maid dare not come till you ring for her—and I don't think you will ring," with a glance at the bell-rope that was out of her reach. "No one else, I think, will disturb you, since Hugo is out."

"He will be back," she retorted, but she stopped with sudden cunning. At any price she must keep Richard till Hugo did come back. He would be ruined then.

"He will be back—but not in time!" He rose, bent over her, and she could not even recoil in the fright that sickened her. Like a helpless log she lay in her gorgeous bed, among the possessions she had sinned that her sons might own. She closed her eyes that she might not see the face she had loved and then hated, till she sold her soul to pay for the scorn she had seen there.

"Are you going to kill me?" she whispered.

"It was not I who murdered an old man," he returned slowly. "Yet tonight I could almost find it in my heart, for I owe you another debt than my own, Alicia. What have you done with my daughter?"

The sudden question relaxed the tension of her fright a little; she opened her eyes and met his with her old arrogance.

"What do I know of your daughter? I did not even know you owned to her!" with the insolent sneer Jocelyn had dreaded; but it died in deadly terror. Then she gave the shriek that Jocelyn heard shrieked, but like lightning an iron hand was over her mouth.

"Be quiet, and answer me!" he ordered. "Scream, and you will answer me still; if I kill you, I will have the truth out of you. My daughter Jocelyn came here by accident to be your companion; she found me out, and I here, before you dreamed of danger. Today Gilbert told me you and Hugo had turned her out, without money, at night. Told me, too, that she had never been seen since. What have you done with her?"

Merciless, even as Alicia had been in her day, he leaned over her.

"How do I know where she went?" Icy cold beads started on her forehead. "She was a spy——"

"What were you for years but a spy on me?" he retorted. "If you lie to me now, you will make me forget you are a woman and a cripple. The girl is in the house, and I will have her."

"Have her, then! Go look for her!" the cripple screamed, knowing well that the key was with Hugo, the doors too heavy to force. "But you had better go to London and look there. The girl is like her mother, she will never starve."

But she had gone too far.

"You told that lie often enough; you shall never tell it again," the veins standing out on his forehead. "When I came here I meant to have mercy on you—now—where is the girl?" His voice rose till it seemed to thunder in her ears. She closed her eyes, not to see his that were filled with somber fire, cold, significant. Was he going to kill her? She felt his hand on her shoulder.

Neither saw the hangings parted, nor saw that of the two figures behind them only one entered. Jocelyn, sick lest he had indeed forgotten that his enemy was helpless, caught Richard de Burgh by the arm.

"Father!" a strange figure in her dusty gown, with her face wan with excitement and weariness, her blood-stained handkerchief still bound round her cut hand, she stood clutching him. "Oh, father, never mind her! She hasn't hurt me. I'm here."

Huntley, standing behind the curtain, turned away. He was looking on what was no business of his. No one had any right to stare at father and daughter now, as they stood clinging to one another, the man's face radiant, unbelieving, as he caught her to him.

"Where have you been? What have they done to you?" De Burgh cried, catching sight of her bandaged hand.

"Nothing! They didn't hurt me. I did that myself." She spoke quietly, but he could feel how wearily she leaned on him. "But you were right. I was here all the time."

"My little girl!" he said very pitifully. "My little girl!"

But she had turned a little away from him; she leaned on him still, but her great eyes were fixed on Alicia, where she watched them waiting her chance to shriek till she made the castle ring.

"You knew!" with her blood-stained hand she pointed straight at the malignant cripple. "You lay here that night and pretended to be frightened; you sent me to follow your son to what might have been my grave."

"I knew nothing about you!" coolly, for the terror of death had gone from her. Richard would not kill her before the girl. She was brave, and she calculated now how long must pass till Hugo could be back. She must keep them talking till he came.

"I know nothing about you. You were dismissed, you chose to disappear at once. Now you come back and say you are the daughter of this man! It is all of a piece—Miss Brown," with stinging afterthought.

"You talk nonsense, Alicia. The girl is my daughter, and you know it," her stepson said sternly.

"As for that, I will prove it to you—with other things—in a minute. Tell me what you mean, Jocelyn, about your following Hugo?"

His face hardened as he heard. Though he said nothing, that sickening terror that was worse than death came back to Alicia's heart.

"Bah!" she thought, struggling against it, "he can't prove his marriage. If there were proofs I should have found them."

"Well," she said aloud raspingly, "your proofs—where are they?"

Richard de Burgh moved quietly to the sitting-room door. As he disappeared a sudden impulse of desperate pity for the woman in the gorgeous bed came over Jocelyn.

"Oh, tell!" she implored, with streaming eyes. "Confess you did it. Clear him, and we will say nothing to the outside world——"

Alicia laughed.

"You little fool!" she said contemptuously, "do you think I fear you and your crazy father?"

Jocelyn covered her face with her hands. Oh! if only she could run from this room where the lights shone on the glitering trinkets, the wizened, dreadful figure in the brocade-hung bed.

In weakness and despair, she stood with covered face, and did not see that her father led in a woman, whose old bonnet and purple shawl were strangely incongruous in the luxurious room.

"My proofs are here!"

Richard de Burgh stepped back, and the newcomer stood looking at Alicia for the first time in nineteen years.

"Martha!" she gasped. "Martha Hewitt!"

Jocelyn's hands dropped from her face; she ran to the old woman and would have kissed her, but Martha, with a strange, rough dignity, put her by.

"Not now, Miss Jocelyn! There's no time for you and me. 'Tis Mrs. De Burgh I've come to speak with."

Alicia's eyes were shut, her fingers clawed the coverlet. If Martha Hewitt dared to come and witness on Richard's side, the noose was round her own neck; the property lost to her sons and her blood forever.

"Eh! but you're changed." At Martha's voice Alicia ground her teeth. Oh! where was Hugo?—even Gilbert? Would neither come to save her? She kept her eyes closed that she might not see the woman whom once she had terrorized.

"Changed! but I'd have known you anywhere, though you're not the fine, upstanding lady you were when you deceived me into letting Mr. Richard be taken. If I'd known that night what I know now, 'tis not he that would have spent these years in prison."

A faint cry of agony came from Alicia's white lips; sickened, Jocelyn turned away. But there was no pity in Martha Hewitt.

"Aye! m'm, you cry out, now that your sin's coming home to you. But what about the black sin of holding my tongue that you put on me for these nineteen years? What about the mother that died in poverty and sorrow? The child you'd have left to starve, that would have starved but for me, a poor servant, and Miss Barry that took us both in for pity of the poor young thing she saw die? 'Twas the shock, the belief that he"—pointing to Richard—"the husband she loved was a cruel murderer that killed her. Her death is on your head, Mrs. De Burgh! Heaven forgive me, on mine! For I had not sense to know the truth, and comfort her. There was small comfort for any of us but you in those days. You lay warm in your bed, while Mr. Richard was condemned by your lies; while his wife, his child, and me came near to starving."

"I never knew he had a wife," the strange, hollow voice was altered indeed from Alicia's.

"You knew well enough," Martha retorted. "The old man told you—told you that night in your sitting-room that Richard had a wife and child, and he would never leave the property away from them. That was what maddened you to—what you did! I heard all he said, in here, filling the hot-water cans. But I thought then he was still talking to Mr. Richard."

"So he was."

"He was talking to you!" Martha's face was full of the dignity of truth. "Mr. Richard had gone. Oh, Mrs. De Burgh, I know it all now! If I'd not been a simple fool of a servant woman, never used to thinking for herself, grown just to a machine for obeying your orders, I'd have known it then."

She came nearer to the bed, wrinkled, earnest, terrible, she towered over the woman whose sins had brought her low.

"I ran in that night, I caught the old man by the wrist," the even, low voice thrilled its hearers with tragedy, the humble, old woman was grand as she spoke out for the righting of the wronged. "I know now who struck me on the wrist till I dropped him; I know how you slipped out through the curtain as Mr. Richard got to my side. And you, standing in the middle of the room, struck the light that showed him to me. And I mean to go and tell it, if need be, before the highest in the land. I'll hold my tongue no more and see the innocent punished for the guilty."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE WOLF'S MOUTH.

As Martha's hard voice ceased, the room seemed full of a silence like death. Immovable as a corpse Alicia lay, her black eyes indomitable yet. No one moved, yet no one knew for what they waited.

In the hush of the brilliant room there came the dull echo of a sudden distant commotion. Alicia's dull gaze turned fiery. She was saved; Richard was ruined! Hugo had returned.

With all her strength she lifted the hands that were the only part of her body that obeyed her will; she cried out aloud in triumph.

"You've stayed too long—threatened too much! Hugo is here, and while there is breath in his body I will never give in to a servant and a madman. I pray," with slow, vicious emphasis, "that you may live years, Richard de Burgh, in the asylum—where tomorrow you will go—that you may lie helpless and agonized there, for your child's future, as I have lain here for mine!"

A curious, inexplicable shiver shook Jocelyn from head to foot as she heard; she felt as though death stood beside her in the room.

"Jocelyn!" Huntley's voice rang loud as he called from Gilbert's room.

"Who is that?" her father said, startled.

"Hush, it's all right!" she said quickly. "But there's something the matter. Wait till I find out what it is."

But she knew, as she ran to Huntley, Hugo had come home; her father was lost!

"What shall I do?" she cried, wild with anxiety listening distractedly to heavy footsteps coming up the stair. "It's Hugo back. He will take my father."

"I don't think he will!" very slowly. "You have done with fighting your own battles. I will fight them now!"

Lord Huntley, of Holycross, very white and set about the mouth, opened the door and strode out into the hall.

"Is that you, Hugo?" he said. "Come here, and speak to me."

But there was no answer; only the heavy tread of men coming up the stairs, carrying something—something that was heavy, as the dead are.

As Huntley waited, staring, Gilbert ran up to him by a small staircase.

His face was white and drawn, and he reeled as he ran.

"Don't call—he'll never answer you," he said sharply.

"What?" Huntley caught him as he staggered.

"He's dead!" simply. "I saw it all, but I wasn't near enough; no one was," he broke off with a thick, short sob that was bad to hear. Sick and unstrung, he leaned on Huntley.

"Dead? How?—tell me what you mean!"

Gilbert pointed dumbly. Round the turn of the great staircase came four men, treading carefully carrying a hurdle whereon lay Hugo de Burgh, coming home for the last time to the house of his fathers. His face was covered with a clean white handkerchief, the lower edge of which was scarlet.

Huntley moved to follow the men as they carried their quiet burden to Hugo's own rooms, but Gilbert caught his arm.

"Wait, don't go!" he said thickly. "Help me go and tell my mother."

"Richard is with her."

For the first time Huntley pitied the woman who had defied fate—till tonight!

"I know. Moore told me."

He passed in front of Huntley, by Jocelyn without even seeing her, and straight into his mother's room.

"Hugo!" she cried as he entered. "Where is Hugo? Send him to me." With a shaking finger she pointed at Richard. "Let the servants," she panted, "seize that man!"

Gilbert did not seem to hear her. He went to the bedside and fell on his knees, taking her thin hands in his.

"Mother," he said, with a sob in his throat, "don't call Hugo! He can't come. There is no one to come to you now but me."

"You?" she stared at him. "What's the matter? Why do you hold my hands like this? I want Hugo—not you. Get up, I tell you. That is your stepbrother, the lunatic. He has been threatening me—frightening me; send for the servants and have him locked up."

"There's no need," wearily. "Mother, can't you try to understand? Hugo is—gone!"

Alicia de Burgh's scream rang through the house.

"Dead? My Hugo!" With her final strength she tore her hands from Gilbert's. "And you dare to come and tell me? You live, while he is dead! A miserable coward that could not even save him!"

"I couldn't save him; no one could." His voice was very gentle, his heart sick unto death. "Oh, mother; listen! He heard me say tonight that Richard was at Glen Farm, he went straight there to look for him; I spoke to him at the door as he was going, but he was too angry to answer me. He took two of the men from the stables, and then I saw he would go I followed him. I was afraid—I did not know Richard was here," stammering.

"Go on—tell me quickly!" she cried, not a tear in her miserable eyes.

"I caught up with him at Glen Farm; he was quarreling with Moore, who told him Richard was here. He had sent the two men out of ear-shot, but we were all in the cottage, we three, the men and I, standing outside the kitchen door, Hugo and Moore inside. Hugo knocked Moore down; the next instant Moore's dog sprang on him from behind Moore. Hugo had a revolver, and I heard him fire it—once. But the dog had him by the throat. When we got him off they were both dying. The men and I saw it all, but it was too quick. Moore told Hugo twice that the dog would fly at him if he saw his master struck, and Hugo laughed."

As he knelt on a level with her hands, she struck him in the face.

"How do you dare to come and tell me it was his fault?" she cried. "You, who let a dog kill him, that was so strong and full of life. Oh, my son, my son! And I have no other."

"Mother!" But there was no pity in Alicia's heart for the cry of despair.

"I have a miserable, cringing object that is secretly on the side of my enemies," she went on fiercely, "a man who stood by and let his brother be killed because he had no courage to fight for him. I tell you that it is not you that shall profit by his death, not you! I will have"—she pointed her yellow, clawing forefinger at Richard de Burgh. "I will let that man go free. I will tell all rather than let you be master of Castle De Burgh—who say you are my son, and dare to face me with your cowardly crying."

Gilbert rose, slowly and heavily, like a man grown old.

"There is no need to tell me—I know!" He was almost too sick to speak. "I know more than you do, more than Richard does. You may speak or not, Heaven knows I would gladly have died if I could have saved you this—but knowing what I do, I will never call one stone or stick in Castle De Burgh mine. They are, and always have been, Richard's!"

He held out his hand dumbly to Huntley.

"Give her the letter," he said very low. "But, mother, listen! Even if all this is true, I'll never turn from you. I'll save you to the last drop of my blood. We can go away, you and I. I'll work for you, take care of you—don't, for Heaven's sake, talk of hanging——"

"I want none of your pity, none of your care," she cut him short, with her old, sneering insolence. "All I want of you is to be gone out of my sight. What I did, I did for Hugo and you. Hugo is dead, and a coward is no son of mine. Give me the letter!"

But though her voice was full of its old arrogance, she was blind with sorrow when Huntley gave it to her.

"Read it aloud," she muttered harshly. "But, no! I don't care what is in it. What does it matter? Hugo is dead." She beckoned to Jocelyn. "Come here, girl! You have stuff in you. I like you. I'll tell you all. Neither Gilbert nor Moyra shall profit because Hugo is dead. I hate them—I've always hated them."

She broke off, panting, clutching Jocelyn's unwilling hand.

Moyra! No one had thought of her.

"Go to her," the girl whispered to Gilbert. "Comfort her." He would be better out of the way, and Huntley, who was a magistrate, must stay to take down what Alicia said.

"Don't tell us; we know," the girl said pitifully, for the strange courage of the woman was dreadful to her. "Only say is Martha's story true?"

"True," Alicia said slowly. "Listen, girl! I loved your father; he would have none of me, and I married his father to pay him out, for one thing; to be near Richard, in the house with him, able to see him all day long, for another. But I tell you it was hell on earth to me, hell! He never spoke to me if he could help it; he used to go away for weeks, leaving me here with the old man; dull, miserable, with a hot aching where my heart should have been; despairing, for I saw he cared nothing for what I had done or could do.

"Then my boys were born, and I grew to hate him, for everything would be his—nothing theirs. And yet when he was in the house I loved the very sound of his voice. Oh, you were cold and hard to me, Richard de Burgh," turning her miserable face to him; "you brought your fate on yourself. I used to sit and plan how I could get you disinherited; for years I walked the floor at night when the old fool I had married slept, and could think of no way. I was young, I was pretty; in ten years I grew old and worn with hatred and misery. Was that nothing? Did I not owe you something for those interminable years of pain? Then there were ten years more, when I only hated you, only wished I dared to murder you some night when you slept. At last I found out something—that you had been in love for years with a woman in London whose husband was alive. That maddened me. I don't know why; you never loved me, but the very thought that you were wrapped up in another woman was poison to my soul. But one dark evening I saw my way, suddenly like lightning it was clear to me. I told your father you loved a disreputable woman. He was angry, and sent for you. He thought I went away, but I only went into the conservatory. I heard him rail at you because you did not marry, and you swore you were married, had been married to the woman for two years, and had a child. He stormed at you for not telling him, and you gave no reason—you went out, and I—I came in," her voice rose high with triumph. "But your father said he would forgive you, and I was desperate. Had I sinned for nothing? Had I lived in hell only to see my sons beggars?

"I pushed the old man from the open window. I struck Martha on the wrist till she dropped the slight hold she had on him. I slipped through the curtain as you came in, and lit a match just in time for Martha to find you beside her; you, not me! Oh, I tell you my blood was wild in me! I could have fought a hundred Richard de Burghs. I got Martha to go that night, believing she must hide or witness against you; I talked to Miss Barry till to save you from hanging she swore you were crazy; I got you convicted and shut in the asylum, for I swore that while my son lived yours should never set foot in Castle De Burgh.

"Nerine's Second Choice"

This thrilling romance, by Adelaide Stirling, will run as a serial in COMFORT, beginning with our January number.

It is a beautiful story quite as strong as "Love and Spite" though with a very different and less tragic plot. It has a pathetic appeal and heart interest that compel the reader's sympathy and admiration for the lovely and lovable heroine.

To the bleeding heart disconsolate because of unrequited love it bears a message of transcendent hope that lights the pathway out of despair up to the heights of triumphant and enduring bliss.

We are sure this delightful story will please our readers many of whom have asked us to run another serial by the talented author of "Love and Spite."

Don't miss the interesting first part in January COMFORT. Two-year renewal or extension this month for 30 cents.

Make Sure by Renewing Your Subscription Today

A Visit to Three Hundred Homes

in all parts of the United States and an introduction to the families that occupy them. That is what the COMFORT HOME ALBUM gives you in pictures and letters from their owners. Stewart Phonograph

A Wonderful Christmas Present

The Stewart Phonograph will bring music, fun and good cheer into tens of thousands of homes this Christmas.

Everybody wants this wonderful instrument. It is the musical marvel of the age—the supreme entertainer. It is the finest, most appropriate present you could buy.

And the cost is only $6.50—easily within reach of everyone.

So moderate a price is astounding. Only our great factory facilities and a production of thousands of Stewart Phonographs a day make it possible.

Here is your opportunity to give a Christmas present that will be welcomed by your whole family. It will delight and entertain them all.

The Stewart Phonograph not only reproduces music, but reproduces it in full, round, natural notes. No popular priced phonograph can even approach it in musical quality and clear, lifelike reproduction. A newly designed tone arm and a big scientifically correct sound chamber give it a quantity and quality of tone that is absolutely unsurpassed.

And the Stewart Phonograph has a universal reproducer which enables it to play records of any type, any make, any size or any price. This gives you choice of an unlimited collection of records.

You can hear the famous $1000-a-night song birds, the greatest instrumentalists, the comic opera stars, the funniest comedians, right in your own living room. They actually become members of your family circle—always ready to thrill, amuse and inspire you. The best bands and orchestras the country can boast will play dances, marches, stirring symphonies or the latest popular airs for you.

Just imagine what such an instrument would mean in your home these long winter evenings.

The Stewart motor is acknowledged to be the best in any popular priced phonograph. Its quietness and smoothness are astonishing. A single winding plays two ten-inch records.

And here's another big exclusive Stewart Phonograph feature. There is a stop which automatically stops the tone arm when the piece is finished. This prevents gouging and destroying the records.

Then there is a time control by means of which you can get any time you want. It is instantaneous—no fussing—no bother.

But the Stewart is not only a marvelous musical instrument—it is a beauty, too. It is finished in that beautiful verde green—the color so often used on high grade clocks, costly vases and other works of art.

Think of such an instrument for only $6.50. It's a remarkably low price to pay for years and years of entertainment.

Don't fail to have a Stewart Phonograph in your home this Christmas. It is just what you want to give your family—just what they've always wanted at home.

Nothing you could buy would be more appreciated. Nothing you could give would do more good and bring greater happiness.

The Doings of The Dapperlings

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1916, by Lena B. Ellingwood.
(All rights reserved.)

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.—The Dapperlings are kind-hearted, gay little elf-like beings who ride on rabbits and never let themselves be seen by human eyes because of their belief that, if seen, it would bring some terrible calamity upon them. For this reason their queer little houses are always built into the hillside, and are so made, with doors and windows in front and grass growing on the backs, that they can be turned around to face out when the Dapperlings are by themselves; but as soon as anybody comes in sight the houses are whirled around so that only the grass-covered backs are seen and, as these look like the rest of the hill, you would never know the houses were there. They also have an underground assembly hall with an opening in the top covered with moss and concealed in a clump of thistles.

Down by the mill brook in the meadow near the Dapperling village is the favorite playground of five-year-old Simmie-Sammie Smith and his sister Pittysing, nearly two years older, but, of course, they don't know anything about the Dapperlings. Nattie, the Smallest Dapperling of All, has watched these children at play and is not afraid of them. She would play with them if the Dapperling rules permitted, and she does meddle with their playthings slyly and unseen, much to their bewilderment. She takes Pittysing's doll and embroidery scissors, when she isn't looking, and carries them to the assembly hall to show to the other Dapperlings. Lulie Wye Dapperling makes the doll a wonderful new dress. Pittysing grieves for her doll and worries over the loss of her mother's scissors which she had borrowed without permission.

CHAPTER III.

HOW THE DOLL WAS FOUND

AFTER hunting for the doll until she was tired, Pittysing sat down to rest, and wiped her sweaty little face on her short sleeve.

"Simmie-Sammie," she questioned, "IS it, or AIN'T it, any use to keep looking for things in a place, when you KNOW they're not IN that place?"

"It AIN'T," answered Simmie-Sammie promptly. He didn't have to stop to think about it. Anybody would know that.

"Then I'm going to play!" Pittysing declared. "It's no use to look anywhere else, for 'twas here I left 'em! And I'm all done. We'll go down the brook and finish the dam we started this morning to keep the trout from going down stream."

The children sometimes fished in the brook, but they never caught any fish. Perhaps it was because their mother never let them use fish hooks. You see, she was afraid they would stick the fish hooks into their hands—or possibly their eyes. And bent pins don't work very well for hooks, as you know if you have ever tried them.

But the children thought if they could build a little dam strong enough to stand, the fish would not be able to swim over it, and perhaps could be dipped up in a pail.

The little brook always washed away the dams, objecting, perhaps, to having its waters held back. The children never tired of rebuilding them, and had made, or started, as many as twenty, I should say.

"I wish," said Pittysing, "that some beavers would come here! Don't you remember the story papa told about them, how they gnaw down little trees with their long, sharp teeth, and use them for building dams? Oh, say! instead of using just rocks and dirt, we'll take sticks, too, like the beavers, and see if we can't build a dam that will stay!"

"But YOUR teeth wouldn't be long enough or sharp enough to gnaw down twees!" objected Simmie-Sammie disgustedly. "An' you've lost one of the fwont ones, anyhow!"

"Oh, Simmie-Sammie! You're not much more than a baby yet, are you? Did I say I was going to GNAW to get some sticks? Pick 'em up, anywhere you see 'em lying round, and bring 'em to me."

While Simmie-Sammie brought sticks, Pittysing stood on a damp, moss-covered stone in the middle of the brook. Reaching toward the bank to take one from him, her foot slipped and down she sat, splash! in the shallow water. She was not hurt, and sprang out quickly, dripping wet.

"Ugh-h-h!" she shivered. "I've got to run home quick, and get some dry clothes on!"

But when they got to the house, they couldn't find their mother, though they called, and ran from room to room.

"I don't know what clothes she'd want me to put on! Guess I better stay out in the sunshine and get these dry," Pittysing decided. "Let's play scooch-tag. Who'll be IT?"

"You!" answered Simmie-Sammie promptly.

"We'll count for it. Stand in front of me." Then Pittysing chanted slowly, pointing first at Simmie-Sammie, then at herself,

'As—I—went—up—the—apple—tree,
All—the—apples—fell—on—me!
Bake—a—pudding—bake—a—pie,
Did—you—ever—tell—a—lie?
No—I—never—told—a—lie,
But—I—baked—an—apple—pie!'

"You're out, Simmie-Sammie! That makes me IT!"

"I'VE FOUND HER! I'VE FOUND HER!" SHOUTED PITTYSING.

"That's what I told you in the first place," said Simmie-Sammie.

After they had tired of playing scooch-tag, they hunted for four-leaved clovers, which they couldn't find, in the field back of the house, then wandered down to the Mill Brook. Across the brook, grasshoppers were hopping gaily about in the sunshine. The children crossed over, and counted grasshoppers a while, twenty—thirty—forty.

"My stars and body!" exclaimed Pittysing. "Who'd ever believe there'd be so many? We couldn't count 'em all in fifty-nine years! Come on! let's race to the top of the hill! One! put out your left foot. Two! swing your arms. Three! run!"

Simmie-Sammie always thought, before they started, that he could beat Pittysing racing. After they had gone about ten steps, he always knew he couldn't. When Pittysing looked back over her shoulder, expecting he'd begin to cry pretty soon, there was Simmie-Sammie, ever so far back, down on his hands and knees.

"I ain't wacing!" he called, for he didn't want her to think she was beating him that time. "I'm watching this old pillar-catter! If he was long enough, and big enough, he'd make some good furs for your Sawah-Gwace-Josephine!"

Pittysing kept on running till she was almost at the top of the hill. There was a clump of thistles growing just ahead, and she started to run around them, but she stepped on a little round stone that rolled with her, and fell right into those prickly thistles! And she didn't stop there! She went onto a bed of moss, and right through a little trap door, into what seemed like a dark hole.

Oh, yes, of course you've guessed what it was! The Dapperlings' assembly hall, with all the lights out.

For that hill was the Dapperlings' hill, and every single Dapperling house had turned around, quick, as a wink, when the children came in sight.

Simmie-Sammie heard a scream, and looked up just in time to see Pittysing's red hair ribbon go down into the hole.

By the time he got to the top of the hill, Pittysing was scrambling out.

She was covered with dirt, which clung to her damp clothes, and her face and hands were scratched, but she wasn't crying. She was too excited! I guess YOU'D have been excited too! Simmie-Sammie was!

For in one hand she held—what do you think? Yes, that little smiling, blue-eyed, curly-haired doll!

"I've found her! I've found her!" shouted Pittysing. "Look at her dress! Oh, Simmie-Sammie! Simmie-Sammie! WHERE did she get it? Do you s'pose, oh, do you truly spose she's a fairy doll? I'm going straight home to show her to mamma! Come, quick, if you want ME to wait for you!"

"I tell you what it is," said Pittysing, as they hurried along. "If you want to find things, you must just look in the place where they are! If I hadn't done that, would I ever have found my doll?"

Pittysing's cheeks were very red, and she held her head high.

Simmie-Sammie stared at her, wondering how she ever came to be so smart! He was perfectly certain she was the smartest girl in the whole world. But he didn't tell her so! Oh, no! She was feeling big enough without that!

Of course there was trouble to follow, for the embroidery scissors hadn't been found, and when Pittysing's mother (they found her this time when they went to the house) went with her to the top of the hill beyond the brook, everything looked just as it always had, and there was no hole at all that she could have fallen through. And her mother put her to bed for telling wrong stories.

The Dapperlings had been at work, you see, mending their trap door and putting the moss and thistles in order.

Still, even the children's mother couldn't explain where the doll's dress came from.

But she was glad to get her embroidery scissors back next day. Pittysing found them on the barrel-top table. The Smallest Dapperling of All had taken those home with her when she took the doll, they were so bright and shining, and she carried them back. For she hadn't meant to keep them at all.

Chapter IV, in January COMFORT, will tell how our Dapperlings made a long journey to visit their friends at another Dapperling village and of their adventures at the picnic, and how Nattie found a very interesting present to give Pittysing. January Comfort will contain the opening chapters of "Nerine's Second Choice." This thrilling romance by Adelaide Stirling, quite as strong as "Love and Spite" though with a very different and less tragic plot, will run in COMFORT, as a serial.

Some Special Features for January

"Marigolds"—by Hapsburg Liebe

This touching story of the troubled course of love between sweethearts who, like Romeo and Juliet, belonged to families between which rages the deadly strife of an eternal feud, is told by one who has lived among these proud mountain folk of Tennessee whose family honor is dearer than life.

"A Calendar Party"

Describes how to give your friends a unique and amusing entertainment appropriate to New Year Eve or any time in January.

"How to Make Good Bread"

The quality of the "staff of life" is an item of no small importance to the family health; but how many can make good bread?

"A New Year Eve Adventure"

This fine story, full of startling situations, is a genuine thriller, telling of a chain of strange adventures and showing how the rich aristocrats are fleeced by the bold adroitness of the gentleman crook who is finally captured by a humble citizen. There is a good moral in it, too.

Special, Low Rate for December Renewals

As an inducement to renew your subscription promptly this month we offer the special, low rate of 30 cents for a 2-year renewal. If you want the Comfort Home Album send 10 cents extra, 40 cents in all for your 2-year renewal and the Album.

If the number over your name on the wrapper in which this paper comes is 339, or any less number, it means that your subscription should be renewed at once. Send in your renewal today, if you don't want to miss January COMFORT. Use coupon on Page 13.

Crumbs of Comfort

Sensitive beings are not sensible beings.

When the Devil can't come himself, he sends a bottle of drink.

The great secret of success is not to get in the way of others.

Not to wish for what you have not is worth more than to have it.

Men can be to other men as the shadow of a great rock in a thirsty land.

When your expenses exceed your receipts you are sure to come to want.

Those who are without expectation can not fret if nothing comes to them.

A person may go to church all his life and not go to heaven when he dies.

All the work of the world is merely taking advantage of the energies already there.

If you do not exercise your best qualities they will wither and become useless.

Put the right ingredients into making happiness and it will always come out right.

There is a great deal in the world which is beautiful and delightful, but it will not last.

Everything in this world is arranged upon definite principles and never at random.

Two poor people can live in a house together when two kings can not live in a whole kingdom.

Spend the time you have spent in sighing for fruits, in fulfilling the conditions that produce them.

Theologies are human versions of divine truths, hence the varieties and the inconsistencies of them.

Don't give all the praise to the horse that wins the race, but give some to the man who keeps the stable.

The Creator has done as much for the world as should be expected of Him. It is for man to do the rest.

Think a minute before yielding to your temper how much more you suffer from anger than enjoy from it.

Every individual's life is a sermon. Some are long and some are not good, but they are sermons just the same.

If we try to influence others we shall soon see that success is in proportion to their belief in our belief in them.

It is the beautiful work of Christianity to adjust the burdens of life to those who bear them, and to adjust them to their burdens.

However old a married union is it still garners some sweetness. Winter has some cloudless days and under the snow a few flowers still blossom.

The Way of a Woman

By Maud Mary Brown

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

LESBIA VAUGHAN, in her hyacinth-tinted gown, sitting where a shaft of sun brought into high relief her delicately chiseled face and the vivid lights in her deep-brown eyes, was very lovely.

She set her cup down with a decided click and began with nervous fingers to rearrange the tea service on the table before her.

"For my part, I hope Lydia will never enter Godfrey Towers's handsome carved doors again. But she will. She and the children will stay abroad till the scandal dies down and then she will come back and try to deceive us into thinking that her heart isn't mangled to a pulp. And that is the way of a woman."

Isn't it strange, Lesbia?" Mrs. Thornton asked.

"That that is the idiotic way of a woman? It's more than strange. It is inconceivable."

"I wasn't meaning that, Lesbia. To me, the surprising thing is the willingness with which we abdicate our power over our husbands. We let them slip from indifference to guilt and when the inevitable cataclysm overtakes us, our impulse is to pick up our skirts and scurry out of the reach of unpleasantness."

Lesbia brought her hands, clutching, to the arms of her chair.

"You don't mean that you blame women for the depravity of their husbands? You can't mean that, Edith!"

"In so many, many instances," Mrs. Thornton said quietly.

"But that's brutally unjust! There's sweet, gentle Lydia Towers. Would you blame her for Godfrey's cheap intrigue with one of his own stenographers? Would you?"

Mrs. Thornton leaned forward, her deep eyes burning into Lesbia's.

"Do you suppose," she asked, "that if the average man found in marriage all that it promised—sympathy, companionship, passion—the whole diapason of emotion, that wild horses could drag him away from his wife?"

"But," expostulated Lesbia, "we have our disillusionments, too. Marriage is a far cry from the romance we ignorantly anticipate. But we don't slip a moral cog because our cup of happiness isn't always slopping over."

Mrs. Thornton smiled. Her smile was the only thing about her friend that irritated Lesbia. It was one of so much experience and understanding that it made her own impetuosities seem to her childish and inconsequent.

"I didn't promise to serve as a trained nurse to Norman's morals when I married him."

"A man's emotional nature needs a little nursing now and then, and if his wife won't do it, she need not be surprised if he seeks first aid of some other woman. And she probably won't specialize on morals, either."

Lesbia sat, elbow on knee, chin resting in slender hand, looking into the fire that was grateful even with the April sun streaming in at the windows.

Her scorn of the moment before had been swept away. "You make me feel that being a wife is a stupendous undertaking."

"To realize that is the beginning of wisdom."

Mrs. Thornton rose and went over to the fire. She was a woman of fine though generous proportions—a woman molded for motherhood. That she was a widow and childless seemed an anomaly.

"We suffer and bear and rear," Lesbia began.

"That carries its own reward," Mrs. Thornton interrupted to say.

"Oh, Edith, why need the whole burden physical and moral, rest on our shoulders?"

It was the cry of a distraught child.

"God knows."

Mrs. Thornton stood with one hand on the mantel looking into the fire.

"If we had ten hands we would still see unaccomplished tasks; the strength of ten would not forestall weariness, nor the wisdom of ten render us infallible. It's hard. But, Lesbia, isn't it splendid to be so useful?"

She turned, her face alight.

Lesbia shuddered. "No. It's only paralyzing. Edith, it's a merciful thing Norman's good. If he should do what Godfrey Towers has done I should take my children and go where we could never see his face again. And that's the way I should meet my trouble."

"Why, no you wouldn't," Mrs. Thornton said confidently. "You would do the right thing. If there was a fighting chance to get your happiness back, you would take it. If it meant giving him up to a more understanding woman, you would do that without a cringe. That's the way of a woman like you."

Lesbia shook her head. "You don't know me. I should be flint."

Mrs. Thornton went over and placed her hand on Lesbia's fair head in an unaccustomed caress.

"I must run along. Don't get up."

At the door she turned.

"I sometimes think that we women are like the peasant in the Russian legend.

"The wise men, you remember, passed her cottage and asked her to go with them to seek the Child, but her household duties were pressing and she waited to finish them before going. When she was ready, the heavens were darkened. And she never saw the Christ."

There was a little sob strangled in her throat.

"We are too intent on trivialities. We let the big thing, love, flicker and die out leaving us under darkened skies, alone."

There was in her face the look of one who has paid extortionate tuition in the school of life.

Alone, Lesbia wandered restlessly about, straightening a magazine on the handsome library table, laying wood on the living coals of the fire, rearranging the mass of yellow jonquils in their dull, green bowl.

She roamed into the big drawing-room and touched the keys of the piano with idle fingers, but their silvery tones did not tempt, so she went back to the library and curled herself up on the couch, a little, hyacinth-tinted heap.

"Oh, life, life!" she cried sharply. "You are much too relentless and complex for us!"

Her lovely face from which the rounded contour had scarcely been worn or its freshness dimmed in the six years of her married life, grew suddenly strained.

"What if it had come to me?" she whispered. "What if it should come to me!"

She sprang up with an excited little laugh.

"How idiotically morbid! Norman's the soul of honor. It isn't very loyal to think of such things. I'll go up to the nursery and recover my reason."

There, with her four-year-old son and his tiny sister, she found surcease for her quivering nerves.

"There," she said, going to her dressing-room after they were tucked into their diminutive beds, "I've done for one unlaid ghost. Being a mother makes a woman very safe."

She suddenly remembered that Lydia Towers was a mother, too, and of the faithfulest.

The vague distress came back intensified by her brief respite.

She found herself listening for Norman's step while her maid did her hair.

"Why doesn't he come?" her nerves cried out.

A glance at her watch told her that she was dressing unusually early and she relaxed.

At last she heard him on the stair and a minute later in his room, whistling gayly as he moved about.

It was what Lesbia had listened for and heard for six years and its familiarity calmed her.

Of course everything was all right with her and Norman.

"Hello, in there," she called blithely.

"Hello, yourself, Peaches."

His favorite love-name thrilled her with its dear silliness.

"I'm coming in in a minute," he called.

When he stood before her he was overwhelmed afresh at the slim, fragrant loveliness of her in her bewildering array of white and gold.

"Will you look who's here," he said confidentially to the enraptured maid. And to Lesbia, "I approve of you, my dear, I do, upon my word. But I suspect all that gorgeousness means a stupid evening out. Does it?"

Lesbia touched the golden fillet in her hair with deft fingers.

"It's the Landon's dinner and dance," she reminded him, glowing under his ardent eyes.

"But, cheer up, it's just about the last for the season."

The maid slipped out of the room and Norman, his hand clasping hers boyishly, drew Lesbia to a divan.

"I wanted the evening with you," he scolded good-naturedly. "They've got the roadster overhauled. It's as good as new. I wanted to plan a trip for just us two tonight."

"Norman, you know I'd love to go off with you alone. How we used to plan such trips. But we were as irresponsible as linnets then, weren't we? Now there are the babies. I can't leave them. And the house has to be made ready to close, and the cottage needs a lot of new furnishings before it's opened. I can't seem to leave things to servants as I thought once I could. I'm going to be madly busy."

"Lesbia, tell me, would you really like to go off with me alone now?" His eyes were frankly searching.

She colored. "You foolish! Perhaps I don't enjoy gypsying as you do. I may be more inured to civilization and modern plumbing. But of course I would enjoy it if I could manage it. Why don't you get Harry Atherton to go?"

"The boy will soon be big enough," Norman said wistfully. "And won't the little beggar like the camping equipment? That's something to look forward to."

Lesbia turned sharply. "Do you suppose I would let Burgess go off with you, drinking out of wells and eating all sorts of unwholesome food? You're crazy!"

Norman stood up. "I hope I take Mrs. Thornton in tonight," he said with gloomy irrelevance.

Lesbia found her eyes roaming to her husband's face with curious constancy that night. Mrs. Thornton was at his left, and it was to her he turned oftenest.

During a lull in the insistence of the chatter, Lesbia heard him describing to her his camping outfit for the roadster. He was obviously enjoying her genuine interest.

Lesbia was proud of Norman—of his marks of race—but infinitely more of the attention given to his opinion when he vouchsafed a grudging word to the general conversation.

"Norman," she said as they drove home, "did you see Godfrey Towers today?"

"He lunched at the club," Norman replied with a man's reluctance to touch a subject that will end in criticism of a friend.

"How can he have the audacity to show his face among people!"

Norman was extenuating. "I say, Lesbia, Towers's actions have been pretty raw, I'll admit, but we can't measure his temptation so let's keep our yardstick off his sins."

"Temptation!" Lesbia blazed like sudden flame. "And with a wife like Lydia."

"Lydia's an all-right girl, no doubt about it. But perhaps she hasn't realized, quite, that even if she is married, she's in competition with every other woman in sight. It's possible that Norman's emotional nature was under-nourished by Lydia."

They were in the hall of their home. Under the glare of the light, Lesbia's face showed white with a resurgance of the afternoon's tumult.

"Men seem to have buried their moral natures to make way for the emotions. It's all wrong, Norman. It's like an insidious poison corroding the very souls of men."

"Better go to bed, dear, and not try to solve the whole social problem at one sitting."

She went, but she was too shocked to evoke forgetfulness.

Was Norman right? Must a wife strive against other women in order to possess her husband's fidelity? It was revolting. It frightened her. But what if it were true!

Followed a busy fortnight during which Lesbia's haunting fears were crowded into the background, for an occupied woman has little time for abstractions. But when her mind and her hands were idle, they marched to the front, captained, full-panoplied and in stately order.

May, her birth-month, came at last in all its fresh, soft glory.

"When is Sylvia going to show up?" Norman asked one morning. He had noticed a letter in her sister's handwriting in Lesbia's hands.

Her eyes were showery as she looked up.

"Norman, it's too bad! That erratic Joan Caruthers has set her wedding for the twenty-sixth and Sylvia's her maid of honor. It will be the first birthday we haven't celebrated together."

Norman gave a commiserating whistle. The twins' birthday had always been a day of jubilee for the Burgess family and Lesbia was making eager plans for this one.

"Can't she possibly get here?" he wanted to know.

Lesbia shook her head. "Joan has decided to be married at her lodge in the Catskills forty miles beyond the end of the earth."

She consulted her letter. "Really, it's ten miles in from Shandaken, and from there, after nine, there's no train to Kingston till after eight in the evening. It's the positive limit!"

"I'm awfully sorry, but I suppose Sylvia can't cut it. Since you can't carry out all your plans, let's take the roadster and go off on a jollification by ourselves."

It was the wrong moment to suggest a substitute pleasure, if, indeed, to go would be a pleasure to Lesbia.

"Dear," she fretted, "I wish you would be reasonable. I can't get up and leave my children like that. The baby carried a temperature yesterday and I'm up to my ears in plans for the summer. Get some man to go with you if you must go."

Norman folded his paper with precision. "It seems," he said, rising, "as though I pay enough for service in this house so you could shake a free foot now and then if you really wanted to."

That day Lesbia's mocking ghosts stayed close by her side.

On the morning of the twenty-fifth, Norman was unusually radiant. To Lesbia, her morrow's disappointment very keen, it was almost an offence.

"I'm off for the road at noon," he said with the abruptness of an exploding bomb.

"You aren't going to be away tomorrow?"

"Rather not! I'll be home for the dinner. Order a corker with all the frills. Today the road calls me and I'm off."

A momentary sense of loneliness enveloped Lesbia and she said impulsively: "I'm almost persuaded to go with you."

Not until hours later did she remember the dismayed confusion with which Norman met her suggestion.

At the time, repenting her words as soon as spoken, she felt only relief that he did not second her impulse.

"But I can't," she added hastily.

Norman kissed her at parting with bewildering cheerfulness.

"I don't know where I shall be tonight," he said. "I'm heading up-river. Don't change any more plans than you must because of Sylvia's absence. That would only emphasize your disappointment. So long, little woman."

Late that afternoon, Lesbia's plans for her big dinner being perfected in every elaborate detail, she telephoned to Mrs. Thornton.

She wanted to see her friend if she were at liberty, to hear her voice in any event.

Healthfulness in Food is More Important than Low Price

The principal ingredient of Royal Baking Powder is Cream of Tartar, which is derived from grapes, a natural, healthful food.

The principal ingredient of many baking powders sold at a lower price is alum or phosphate, both of mineral origin and used instead of Cream of Tartar because they are cheaper.

Housekeepers who are influenced by low price when buying baking powder will find that it pays to consider quality first.

The label on the can will show whether the baking powder you now use, or any brand, new or old, that may be offered contains alum or phosphate instead of cream of tartar.

Mrs. Thornton was out of town, a maid informed Lesbia, nor would she be back until the next day.

Lesbia sent to the garage for the big car, but countermanded the order before it was brought around. Then, deciding upon a walk, she took a few rapid turns in the park before she tried to content herself with an absorbing book. Her restlessness was difficult to exercise.

The anniversary morning awoke beaming and ardent, like a beautiful child after a refreshing sleep.

Stanley Burgess, Lesbia's younger brother, called up from his club to felicitate her in his own unceremonious manner, flowers came, and notes, and altogether her day began with auspicious happiness.

After all, yesterday with its lurking shadows was gone. Today was come. Norman would be home in time for dinner with their closest friends. Sylvia would be there in the late evening, and altogether, the prospect was far from cheerless.

It was approaching the hour of five that afternoon when Stanley put in a call for his sister's house.

The butler, unable to translate into sense the young man's message, switched him on to Lesbia's line.

At his sister's voice his own became strained.

"Why—why, Lesbia, I thought you were off motoring with Norman this afternoon."

"Silly! With a big dinner on my hands?"

"Where's he?"

"Norman? Didn't I tell you? He ran off in the roadster yesterday. He'll be here for dinner, though. Why?"

Followed a foreboding silence that made Lesbia's heart pound.

"Stanley," she called sharply, "What is it?"

"Now hold your horses, Lesbia, it's probably nothing at all, but the papers say he's been in a little smash up this side of Newburgh. He's in a hospital there. It isn't serious, they think."

Lesbia's grasp of the receiver whitened her knuckles.

"Hold the wire but don't talk, please, I want to think." Then, "Stanley!"

She waited for his "yes."

"It isn't far to Newburgh? I've been there dozens of times with Norman but I can't think."

"Short of sixty miles."

Then Lesbia's voice rang steady. She suddenly became clear-headed and practical.

"Listen, Stanley. Are you there? Very well. I'll leave my list with Benton. He'll call off the dinner. In half an hour I'll pick you up at the club and we'll go to Newburgh in the big car. Do you understand?"

"Perfectly. And, Lesbia, don't look at the papers. They're inaccurate. While I'm waiting, I'll telephone up."

She rang off.

Had Stanley Burgess been wise enough to have kept the mention of papers out of the conversation, it is probable that Lesbia would never have given them a thought, but now, while giving the butler detailed instructions, the desire to see them obsessed her. Surely, if Norman were seriously injured, or if he were—she did not finish that thought—she ought to know.

"I will telephone from Newburgh," she was saying to Benton. "And, Benton, please—have the evening papers sent to my room at once."

She dressed rapidly and without her maid. She wanted to be alone. When the papers were brought, she shrank from them, but her will lashed her hands till they obeyed its command.

"Norman Vaughan and wife injured in automobile crash," she read.

What a stupid blunder!

But as her eyes swept down the page the mistake did not clear.

There had been a woman. There was no doubt of that. A car, following, had carried the news back to the hotel from which both had started only a few minutes before. There, on the register, the driver had read, "Norman Vaughan and wife, New York."

At the writing, it was impossible to anticipate results, but neither Mr. nor Mrs. Vaughan was thought to have been fatally injured.

So much Lesbia gathered from her frenzied perusal, and the other papers confirmed the news.

She felt numb and disembodied, as though she had just read her own death-notice.

She was glad that she was alone that her strange face and stony eyes might not be peered at with curiosity.

Promptly at five-thirty she was at the curb in front of the club. Stanley came out, his own face white, the words with which he had cursed Norman Vaughan scarcely cold on his lips.

Dismissing the chauffeur and placing Lesbia in front, he took his place at the wheel.

"I telephoned. It's not serious. Still unconscious."

He knew by Lesbia's face that she had seen the papers and he cursed his mental clumsiness in having mentioned them.

In silence they insinuated their way across to the ferry, and although she was still silent as they bowled through the ugly Jersey towns that skirt the city, Lesbia's thoughts clamored noisily.

She found time to be thankful for many things—that her parents had not lived to witness her confusion—that Sylvia could not see her till the first, crushing violence of the storm had swept on—that her babies were too young to know.

She had given her unspoiled youth to this man—her soul and her body—and this was what he had done with both. She had borne his children and through his own dishonor he had rendered them fatherless. It would almost have been better if he had been——. She stopped there. She was thinking too fast.

She knew now that some prophetic sub-consciouness had tried to warn her of impending danger. Those haunting fears, had she known it, were prescient.

What was she going to do? God knew. But at least she must go away with the children. She already panted like one spent with speed.

Only at odd minutes did she give a thought to the woman who was lying in the hospital as Norman's wife. Who was she?

Who the woman is that the heart-broken wife finds to be the companion of her husband, how she treats her and how she greets her husband is a surprising revelation of "the way of a woman", as told in the conclusion of this story to appear in January COMFORT, and points a moral that is well worth pondering. quite a number of years more.

I will take up the subject of dancing. As one who has danced and attended dances, my opinion is that it is a wholesome amusement for young folks. I do not believe in the booklet a theological student once gave me, called "From the Ballroom to Hell." Evil can be made out of any kind of amusement no matter how wholesome it may be in itself. Even a church social may be productive of harm if it is not conducted properly. Isn't dancing better for young people than a party where kissing games are played? I have known a deacon's daughter, who was not permitted to attend dances, go to a public skating rink where she skated with anyone who asked her. Her schoolmates attended invitation dances where every young man who was introduced to a girl had to be vouched for, and no undesirable characters were admitted. Many persons who are opposed to dancing base their objections on the public dance hall in cities. My father, who knew of the evils of these places, was much opposed to us children dancing but when he became aware of the nature of the dancing parties which we attended in our little town, he withdrew his objections as he said he could see no harm in our amusement. Now in my own neighborhood there are some young folks who are opposed to dancing but they go wild over "play parties" where as many as can possibly crowd into a room play kissing games, and they seem to enjoy it, but these are the same "goody-goody" girls and boys who wouldn't be caught near a dance hall, let alone at a dance. Now, dear sisters, which do you think best? The play party or a dance where only a few couples are on the floor at once, so that it is not a bit crowded, and good music to keep step by. What is your opinion?

Best wishes to all. MISS B.

CALIFORNIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I cannot keep still any longer so would like to ask a question of Mrs. Dilly and all the other "Auti's."

Election day was on Tuesday and before going out to vote, I did all my housework, a large ironing, baked bread and got a good meal at noon. Then I went to the polls and voted the way I thought was right and returned in time to prepare a nourishing supper for my family. I cannot see any harm done to me or any of my family and the question I want to ask is—didn't I have as much right (or more) to vote as my neighbor, an old man of eighty years who can neither read nor write but who goes each election day and votes just as anyone tells him to, carrying a huge sample ballot along from which he copies? I say, yes! Any intelligent woman has a right to vote if she sees fit. I do not vote every election that comes along as some do not interest me and I do not vote on street improvements or bonds as I am not a property owner in this part of California. But I say three cheers for California, as by living here I can cast a vote for my favorite man for governor, senator and president this fall. Besides making homelife and pickles I can help make a President.

To Mrs. A. W. King, congratulations on your "spunk" in baby's welfare. I am with you in that respect. I have two children, the oldest is a girl four years old and I fed her and brought her up in the "good (?) old-fashioned way," and how sorry I am today. She was fussy and whined nearly all the time, so when baby boy was expected, a little over a year ago, I started in to study motherhood. I sent to the Government for a book and devoured its contents.

Every magazine I picked up I turned its pages to see what I could learn about babies. Then when baby arrived I started in to practise what I had been studying. My mother was horrified, my sister-in-law sneered, father laughed and even my husband smiled. Now my boy is one year old, a lovely, big, good-natured kiddo and husband no longer smiles, at least not the same sarcastic smile, mother praises and even sister-in-law looks interested. If I have twenty more they will all be raised as my boy was and I now long for another baby to raise the "better way," whereas, before my boy came I dreaded another if it were so cross and peevish as the oldest was. Baby is fed regularly by the clock and between times I have no difficulty in doing all my work, baking, washing, ironing, and crocheting.

Anyone can get a book on infant care by writing to United States Dept. of Labor, Children's Bureau, Washington, D. C., and asking for "Infant Care," by Mrs. Max West. One can also get a book on "Prenatal Care," at same place which is a fine help before baby comes.

Love to COMFORT sisters, CALIFORNIA VOTER.

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Winter Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

ONE of the most artistic and comfortable styles of this season is the coat dress, a style adapted to all figures slim or mature and suitable for serge, gabardine, velvet, satin, or taffeta.

Combinations of material will be as popular as during the spring and summer season, so one may have a bodice of crepe or satin, with a skirt of serge or plaid suiting.

In dresses for girls and children there are many smart models. Some in Empire effect, with quaint pocket trimmings, others with plaits from the shoulders and added jacket effects.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated

1859—Hat. 1868—Dress. Girls' Sailor Blouse Dress, with or without yoke facing, and with sleeve in either of two lengths. This design is good for linen, plaid and other novelty suitings, for serge, gabardine, galatea, gingham and percale.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires five yards of 44-inch material for a 12-year size. The cap illustrated with this dress is made from pattern 1859. Cut in three sizes; children's (three to eight years), girls' (10 to 14 years) and misses' (16 to 20 years), and requires seven eighths yard of 27-inch material for the girls' size. Two separate patterns, 10c for each pattern.

1901—A Set of Utility Bags. Shoe bag, laundry bag and traveling case. For these serviceable models one could use cretonne, rubberized or plain sateen, ticking, drill, denim, crash or twill. The bags could be embroidered and finished with scalloped flaps or bound with ribbon tape.

The three bags are furnished in this pattern and are cut in one size only. The shoe bag requires one yard, the laundry bag one and seven eighths yard, the traveling case one and five eighths yard of 22-inch, or wider, material.

1584—A Desirable and Comfortable Garment. This attractive style is nice for eiderdown, flannel, flannelette, silk, satin or blanket cloth. It is ideal for traveling, as a sleeping garment, comfortable and easy to develop. The hood may be omitted.

Cut in five sizes; two, four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires three quarters yard for the hood and three and three eighths yards for the robe of 27-inch material for an eight-year size.

1902—Doll's Set of Baby Clothes. Santa Claus may bring to mother's girl. Just the thing to please little mothers. There are dolls and dolls, but no doll so dear to the heart of a doll's mother, as one dressed in baby clothes. The designs here shown will be found easy to make, as they are cut on simple one-piece lines.

Cut in three sizes; for dolls, 16, 18 and 20 inches in length. It will require two and one eighth yards of 27-inch material for the dress, one and seven eighths yard of 24-inch material for the wrapper and two and one eighth yards of 24-inch material for the coat, for an 18-inch doll.

1665—A Comfortable, practical undergarment. Girls' combination waist and drawers. For this serviceable model one could use cambric, long cloth, nainsook, lawn, crepe flannelette, silk or domet flannel.

Cut in five sizes; two, four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires two and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a six-year size.

1894—A Dainty Set of Aprons. These styles are nice for lawn, batiste, linen or crepe.

Cut in one size only. It will require seven eighths yard of 36-inch material for No. 1 and one and one quarter yard for No. 2.

1854—An Attractive Apron Model. This practical design is cut with a three-piece circular skirt, and a bib gathered to the belt in back and front, and made with shoulder seams and round neck edge.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires four and one half yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1860—Girl's Dress, with yoke and sleeve in either of two lengths. This style is nice for wool, cloth or wash fabrics.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires two and three quarters yards of 44-inch material for a six-year size.

1855—Girls' Dress, with bloomers. Galatea, gingham, seersucker, repp, linen, corduroy, poplin, gabardine, checked and plaid suiting and serge are nice for this design. The bloomers may be of the same material as the dress, or of flannel, linen, sateen, serge or cambric.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires one and one eighth yard of 36-inch material for the bloomers, and three and one quarter yards for the dress for a four-year size.

1600—Child's Envelope Night Dress in high, round or square neck edge, and with sleeve in either of two lengths. This style will prove a comfort to both mother and child, for with the envelope lap or extension the gown will be kept in place and not "crowd up" as is often the case with the loose models. One could use this design for a "creeping" frock for young children.

Cut in five sizes; six months, one year, two, four and six years. Size two will require two and one half yards of 36-inch material.

1664—Ladies' Empire Night Gown. As here portrayed, batiste, embroidered banding and "Val" lace are combined. The design is also nice for cambric, nainsook, crepe, crepe de chine, lawn and silk.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires five and one half yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1708—A very desirable and popular apron. For percale, gingham, drill, sateen, lawn, or cambric, this model will be found very satisfactory. It is cut with sufficient fullness for comfort and ease in wearing and has deep arm opening.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires four and one half yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1667—Ladies' House Dress with sleeve in either of two lengths. Tub silk striped in blue and white with collar and cuffs of crepe embroidered in blue is here portrayed. The waist and skirt portions have slot tucks in front. Gingham, linen, lawn, crepe, drill, seersucker, chambray, percale, poplin, serge and taffeta could also be used for this style.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six and one eighth yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1866—Ladies' Dress, with removable chemisette. This design will be nice for taffeta, serge, poplin, broadcloth, faille and garbardine. The waist is lengthened over the back to join the skirt, with plaited extensions at the seams. A smart yoke belt trims the hips.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six and three eighths yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1850—Ladies' Yoke Apron. This design is practical and desirable. The yoke is cut with the sleeve in one. Ample pockets trim the apron front.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires five and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1863—An Attractive and Popular One-piece Dress, with sleeve in either of two lengths. Checked plaid, striped and mixed suiting are nice for this style. The fullness is confined by a belt at the waistline. The fronts are cut to form a panel over the center.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1878—A Simple Dress for Mother's Girl, with or without shield. Striped galatea is here shown. Shepherd check, novelty suiting or plaid woolen, serge, gabardine and velour, corduroy and velvet are equally attractive.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires three and one eighth yards of 44-inch material for a six-year size.

1861—Dress for Misses and Young Women, with or without shoulder trimming. The dress is finished in one-piece style, and has the fullness held at the waistline, under the belt. The fullness over the shoulders may be shirred, smocked or plaited.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires six yards of 44-inch material for a 16-year size.

1849—Ladies' Waist, with sleeve in either of two lengths. Georgette crepe, batiste, crepe de chine, tub silk, taffeta, madras, linen, gabardine, poplin and repp, all of these are desirable materials for this model. The fronts may be finished with or without the frill.

Cut in six sizes; 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42 inches bust measure. It requires three and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a 38-inch size.

1872—A Becoming, Youthful Model for misses and small women. This style is especially suitable for soft fabrics such as voile, gabardine, nun's veiling and satin. It is also nice for taffeta, velour, crepe and crepe de chine. The style is simple but attractive.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires six and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for a 16-year size.

1521—A Trim and Popular Suit for Mother's Boy. This model is good for serge, cheviot, broadcloth, flannel, gingham and linen, corduroy and velvet. The blouse is cut in coat style. The trousers are made with side closing.

Cut in four sizes; three, four, five and six years. It requires to and three eighths yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size.

1880—Boy's Suit. Khaki cloth, galatea, serge, cheviot, velvet, mixed suiting and corduroy would be nice for the trousers. For the blouse, linen, madras, percale, soisette and crepe would be very appropriate.

Cut in five sizes; six, eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires two and one eighth yards of 36-inch material for the blouse, and one yard of 44-inch material for the trousers for the eight-year size.

1725—A Simple Stylish Skirt. This is a splendid model for serge, gabardine, corduroy, taffeta, jersey cloth or linen. The model is cut on good lines and with graceful, becoming fullness.

Cut in seven sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32 and 34 inches waist measure. It requires three and seven eighths yards of 44-inch material for a 24-inch size.

1873—Waist. 1877—Skirt. A Fashionable Gown. Taffeta and pompadour silk are here combined. The waist is made with overblouse portions, which may be omitted.

Waist pattern 1873 cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure.

Skirt pattern 1877 cut in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30 and 32 inches waist measure. It will require eight and one eighth yards of 36-inch material to make this costume for a medium size. Two separate patterns, 10c for each pattern.

1864—A Simple School or Home Dress, with sleeve in either of two lengths. Serge, gabardine, galatea, gingham, chambrey, linene, linen, lawn, percale, cheviot mixed and plaid suiting are nice for this style.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires three and one half yards of 44-inch material for a 12-year size.

1870—Ladies' Coat. Plush and velvet fabrics, velour, zibeline, corduroy, cheviot, tweed, novelty suitings and broadcloth are all appropriate for this style. The fronts are lapped in double-breasted style.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six yards of 54-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1871—Ladies' Skirt, with or without pocket trimming. This attractive design is a two-piece model cut with raised waistline, and having gathered fullness at the back.

Cut in six sizes; 20, 22, 24, 26, 28 and 30 inches waist measure. It requires four and one eighth yards of 44-inch material for the 24-inch size.

The Ideal Xmas Present for Baby is a "Rock-a-Bye" Baby Swing.

Babies don't cry when in a Rock-a-Bye. Every move of their little bodies sways the swing and keeps them interested. They get exercise. They're kept off the cold floor and out of dirt. They can't get into mischief, pick up things from the floor which might prove dangerous, or fall out and hurt themselves.

The Rock-a-Bye Baby Swing is made of heavy washable duck on strong, steel frames. It has reinforced strap hangers and screw hook. Can be hung in any doorway, from porch ceiling or tree branch.

Get a Rock-a-Bye for your baby this Christmas.

Send $1.00 now and if you don't think it's the greatest baby entertainer ever we will return your money without question or quibble.

When Baby Catches Cold

By A. M. Hughes, M. D.

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

IT is serious enough when a grown-up person "catches cold," more serious than most people know, but when baby catches a cold it is serious indeed. First, because you cannot administer to a tiny baby the remedies that an adult can take; second, the baby has not yet acquired a constitution rugged enough to ward off the evil effects of a cold so but what some lasting effect may result.

And the one great mistake most mothers make is to keep baby indoors too much!

I have in mind a man whose mother kept him swaddled in thick flannel pads over his lungs and between his shoulders, and kept silk handkerchiefs around his neck under his collar from early autumn until late spring. Furthermore, whenever he went out of doors he had to wear an immense woolen muffler or scarf. The result was that he developed such a weak and tender throat that he finally got chronic bronchitis.

He had a son and from the beginning that baby was allowed to sleep out on the porch throughout the day in the carriage, with his face exposed, regardless of the weather and much to grandmother's woe. In fact, grandmother declared over and over that this treatment would kill the child. Later this young man found himself unable to bundle up his throat when out of doors. He would not even turn up the collar of his overcoat in the bitterest weather. And where his father with the wrapped-up throat had from five to fifteen different attacks of sore throat every winter, this boy never had a sore throat at all!

Too much confinement of the baby in a warm room is more responsible for baby's colds than anything else. In fact your baby's health depends quite as much on an abundance of fresh air as upon warm clothing and good food. Of course when there is a nasty wet, cold sleet storm, or a torrent of cold rain, or a thick fog that will cover your garments with dampness, it is not advisable to take baby out. But never mind the cold dry snowstorm, nor the bitter winter winds so long as baby's body is warmly dressed. Keep his little nose out where he can breathe and give him an outing every day. Let him go to sleep in his carriage out on the veranda or by an open window with all room doors closed to prevent a draft. See to it that he gets fresh air and plenty of it, and then when cold germs come flying around, as we now know they do, your baby will be so rugged and healthy that he will withstand them.

It is quite true that a weak baby and a strong baby may be placed in a room side by side where there are cold germs, and the weak baby will contract the cold while the strong youngster will feel no ill effects. And so, first of all, seek a preventive, for nothing was truer than the saying that "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

I have found, and I am sure every other physician will agree with me, that the babies that have colds all winter long are usually those that are kept most closely confined to the house. Nothing is a better protection against colds than plenty of fresh air. The living-rooms should be well aired every morning and then provided with some means of ventilation, so that fresh air is entering every moment.

There is a tendency to omit the bath during the cold weather, but this should not be allowed. Every morning, the baby should have a warm bath. Of course care must be taken that he does not chill at the time. If the baby is poorly nourished, the bath may be followed by an oil rub. Then the baby should be wrapped warmly and a warm drink given. After this he usually will sleep for several hours. When he has awakened he may be fed again and taken out for his daily constitutional. Of course, on a cold day, he should never be taken out of doors for at least an hour after his bath.

Another cause of colds in babies is the clogging of the nasal passages. The mother or nurse should carefully clean the nostrils at least every morning and evening. If there seems to be a tendency to a clogging of the air passages, the nose should be well oiled. The old-fashioned goose grease has as many virtues as any modern oil.

With babies, a frequent cause of illness is constipation. The baby's bowels must be watched carefully to see that they move freely every day. If there is a tendency to constipation, a little olive oil or cream given twice a day will usually overcome this. Occasionally, it will be necessary to use an enema or injection of warm water. It is never wise to get in the habit of giving the baby a laxative every day or even every week. This habit will become so well established that even after the child is grown, pills or other laxatives will be his constant crutch. Castor oil should rarely be given, as the after-effects are to make the child still more constipated. Constipation can almost always be overcome by a regulation of the diet, by giving olive oil or cream to the small baby, and to the older one, prunes and other laxative fruits, also coarse bread, such as graham bread.

Perhaps no two words carry dread to so many mothers as croup and pneumonia. Croup, while usually the less serious of the two, is perhaps the most alarming to the young mother, for it generally makes its unwelcome visit about midnight. When a mother is awakened from a sound sleep to find a child, who has gone to bed apparently in the best of health, struggling for breath, she naturally is alarmed. Yet, if she can keep her presence of mind, the attack usually can be relieved in a short time and the child will drop to sleep to awaken in the morning feeling as well as ever.

However, a child, who has had one attack of croup is liable to have repeated attacks for several successive nights, so it is wise to fortify against them. No matter how frequently one sees cases of croup, it never fails to awaken a feeling of terror. The oppression and distress for a time are very serious, the face is usually congested, sometimes almost cyanotic, the breathing is noisy, hard and labored, while the sound of the hard, metallic cough makes an impression never to be forgotten. The child seems to be making almost superhuman struggle for breath. This struggle is caused by a spasm of the larynx which does not allow enough air to enter the lungs. If a physician is present he usually relaxes the spasm by a few whiffs of chloroform, but the same results may be accomplished almost as readily by a mild emetic. This relaxes the muscles and also empties the overloaded stomach, for it is a fact that an overloaded stomach usually precedes an attack of croup. A child that is subject to croup should eat a very light and easily digested evening meal.

It is spasmodic croup that I have described, and the difference between that and the more dangerous membranous croup will be explained further on. Every home should be provided with emergency remedies, especially for croup if there is a child in the family.

The best emergency remedy for spasmodic croup—the remedy that is safest and most frequently used—is syrup of Ipecac. When the spasms begin, give a teaspoonful every ten minutes until the child vomits. This is the average dose for a child of two years. For a child of one year dilute the teaspoonful slightly with water. For a child of three or four years, give two teaspoonfuls if the first two doses of a spoonful do not result in vomiting. Do not wait too long, but administer this the moment the child shows a tendency of having spasms, that is, finds it difficult to breathe. An ice cold cloth applied for a few moments to the throat, is also a relief in most cases.

You can buy a croup kettle, for administering the fumes or vapor from hot water and turpentine, but an ordinary tea kettle will do, or any bowl or dish in an emergency. However, the kettle will produce the most vapor. Keep a small bottle of turpentine beside the Ipecac only for this purpose, do not have to rush out to shed or barn where the turpentine is kept with the paints. Three or four drops in the kettle of hot water is enough. Hold the back of your hand over the steam to see that it is not hot enough to burn, then make the child inhale these fumes.

Spasmodic croup is a reflex spasm of the larynx, associated with a mild and not dangerous inflammation of the throat and responds to the above treatment. A slight fever may accompany this.

Membranous croup is a serious condition, the proper name being "laryngeal diphtheria." It is caused by the same germ that causes diphtheria of the tonsils or other parts of the air passages. Treatment: Send at once for nearest physician and while waiting try the remedies used for spasmodic croup, especially the turpentine vapors. In these days physicians should, in serious cases of membranous croup, administer anti-toxin at once.

The difference in symptoms between spasmodic and membranous croup are as follows: If the attack begins in the day, with high fever, unusual shortness of breath, nausea and vomiting, and the cough and hoarseness of croup, it is the membranous variety. If the attack begins at night and still does not clear up at day, and does not respond to the emergency treatment, it is still membranous croup.

Spasmodic croup generally begins at night, and it will respond to the emergency treatment of Ipecac as an emetic, turpentine vapors and an ice cold cloth applied to the throat.

Breathing the hot, dry air from a stove or furnace predisposes to croup. A pan of water should be so placed as to keep the air of the room moist.

No special after-treatment is necessary for ordinary cases of croup. Every effort should be made to prevent the attacks by regulating the food and insisting upon plenty of fresh air at all times.

Pneumonia usually follows exposure of some sort, but lack of fresh air and nourishing food predispose to it, or make the child more liable to contract the disease. A child whose body is in good condition is much better able to resist the exposure than is one who is debilitated from insufficient food or oxygen starvation.

With babies, there is a short, catchy cry that is characteristic of acute pneumonia or bronchitis. Although there are several forms of pneumonia, the form called broncho-pneumonia is most common with babies and small children. The chief symptoms are quick, difficult respirations and a rapid pulse. The child may breathe as often as sixty a minute. The skin feels hot and dry, indicating a feverish condition. The child usually is very restless. Coughing may or may not be present. Sometimes the onset of the disease is marked by vomiting and, rarely, by convulsions. Intestinal complications are common, there often being four or five green stools a day. The urine is usually scant and highly colored.

The disease varies in severity. Some cases would get well with no treatment, while some babies die within twelve hours. As a rule, the baby has a better chance for life if treatment is begun in the early stages. It is here the mother's work is needed. There are many things she can do before the arrival of the doctor. In fact if those who live far from a doctor waited until he arrived before anything was done the baby would have a poor chance for its life. One of the chief requirements is good ventilation. It is better to have the room cold than to have poor air in the room. The baby should be kept warm by clothing and by hot water bottles placed near it. He may have hot drinks to help induce perspiration. His position should be changed frequently. The old-fashioned onion poultice applied to the chest in the early stages doubtless has saved the lives of many babies. Good results may be obtained by rubbing the chest and neck with turpentine and oil. Moist inhalations are as beneficial in pneumonia as they are in croup. The child should inhale the steam for ten to fifteen minutes four or five times a day. The bowels should be kept free. Although the baby will have no appetite and can be coaxed to take only a small amount of nourishment, he will be thirsty and should have as much water as he will drink. If there are signs of collapse, a hot mustard bath may be given. However, the chief aim of the mother should be to keep the baby warm enough to induce perspiration while at the same time he has plenty of fresh air to breathe.

DELICIOUS CHOCOLATE CREAM DROPS

Soak ½ envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine in 2 tablespoonfuls cold water 5 minutes. Mix 2 cups granulated sugar and ¼ teaspoonful cream of tartar together; add ½ cup cold water and boil until syrup is clear. Stir soaked gelatine through syrup quickly and turn in a pan to cool, but do not scrape pan. When partially cool add 1 teaspoonful peppermint (scant measure) or vanilla, and beat until creamy and stiff enough to form in centres. Place small pieces of confectioners dipping chocolate over hot water until melted. Remove and drop centres one at a time into chocolate and place on paraffine paper.

SPARKLING GELATINE

CHRISTMAS DAINTIES

Soak 2 envelopes Knox Acidulated Gelatine in 1 cup cold water 5 minutes. Add 1½ cups boiling water. When dissolved, add 4 cups granulated sugar and boil slowly for 15 minutes. Divide into 2 equal parts. When somewhat cooled, add to 1 part ½ teaspoonful of the Lemon Flavoring found in separate envelope, dissolved in 1 tablespoonful water, and 1 tablespoonful lemon extract. To the other part add ½ teaspoonful extract of cloves, and color with the pink color. Pour into shallow tins that have been dipped in cold water. Let stand over night; turn out and cut into squares. Roll in fine granulated or powdered sugar and let stand to crystallize. Vary by using different flavors and colors, and adding chopped nuts, dates or figs.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

CHICAGO, 3046 Polk St., ILL.

DEAR SISTERS:

I have been interested in Woman Suffrage for some time and more so since it has been discussed in the Sisters' Corner. So far there have been some great letters—Emma Stockinger's, Mrs. Dilley's and Mrs. McKnight's, for instance. My opinion is that states that have given women the vote are just so much more advanced and enlightened than those that have not. Their men have finally awakened from their antediluvian state (as Mrs. McKnight says) and are beginning to realize that it is not fair for them to have all the say. We are just as human as they and our lives are just as much affected by laws as theirs, more, so, in fact. We have to obey said laws, live under conditions invoked by these laws and raise our children under them. Now why, I should like to know, is it that we should not have something to say when it comes to making these all-important laws? I do not see how anyone can bring such foolish arguments as neglecting home and children. The way some talk, one would think it took days to cast a vote, whereas it is a matter of only a few minutes. I know for I have voted and hope to do so many times more. I will tell the sisters just how I voted so those who think it takes one away from their household duties will see just how much time was consumed. I stopped in the polling place on my way to the grocery to do my marketing, was asked my name, age, address, how long resident of same, and a few more questions then I was given a ballot, went in one of the booths, made my X's before the names of whatever candidates I chose. Of course I knew just the ones I was going to vote for, as I had previously made my choice, and as it required only a minute or so, you see it took only about five minutes for me to vote. I count in time well spent, I admire one of these broad-minded, well-read, modern women more so than these "modest violets" or whatever they are called—"shrinking" I believe. It never does to shrink in this world. One wants to expand and that is what men and women are doing who are in favor of suffrage.

I notice one sister says, "Do suffragists know when they vote the women of the red light district will also vote?" Of course we do, but good women are so much in the majority there is no need to worry about the others. I don't think the poor creatures have enough ambition left to vote. When we have a little more to say about laws there surely will not be so many of these poor, unfortunate women.

About the advantages of city and country life, in my opinion Mrs. Hanna was right when she said a child in the city had more educational advantages for there is hardly anything that is not taught in the schools, free of charge and then there are the night schools. But when it comes to making a living for a large family I say the country every time.

Life insurance has been mentioned by some of the sisters. I also believe in it. It doesn't require such an effort to keep up some insurance, the rates aren't very high and what a help it is for the mother and children when the provider is called away. It is really a very important matter when one stops to think it over.

Another question brought up by one of the sisters is the divorce question. My opinion is in this country they go too far with divorce, the divorce laws being altogether too easy. On the other hand, I do not believe in two people living together when they just cannot get along. What is the use of everlastingly wrangling and disagreeing and making both parties miserable. It is little less than a crime to bring up children in such an atmosphere. I certainly do not believe in one party remarrying while the other is alive. Our vows are made to God, "Until death us do part" and if afterwards we cannot agree we are not justified in breaking our vows. If people used a little more common sense before and opened their eyes to see what they were about to do, there would be fewer unhappier marriages and consequently not so many divorces.

One more subject before I close. This subject of birth control. When we have it we will be a nation to be envied. We will not have so many almshouses, insane asylums, homes for incurables and penetentiaries, etc. How many poor souls are born who would be better off if they never saw this world. This idea of quoting the Lord sent them is all "Bosh." Mrs. K. in the September issue, wrote a good letter on the subject.

With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all,
MRS. W. M. REYNOLDS.

BRANDYWINE, W. Va.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am a new subscriber to COMFORT and my first letter is to the Sisters' Corner, which I enjoy very much. I particularly enjoyed Mrs. C. E. West's letter of Coalinga, Cal., for I have a son there who knows her.

I have been married twenty-four years and am the mother of eight children, four boys and four girls, and I have always lived in West Virginia. I am now living in the little town of Brandywine, which has about two hundred inhabitants, situated on the South Fork river emptying into the Potomac at Moorefield, W. Va.

We have in our little town a Christian church of which I am a member and we also have the largest Sunday School in the county. Do you know what made our church Sunday School the largest? We had a Red and Blue Contest starting in July 1916 and ending in September, which increased the attendance sixty per cent. If any of the COMFORT sisters are interested in Sunday school work, and of course they are, try a Red and Blue Contest.

Wishing the COMFORT sisters and all success and hoping to hear from you by letter or through COMFORT,
With best wishes, I am, MRS. J. L. SIMPSON.

Mrs. Simpson. Congratulations on your Sunday school. I don't want to be a pessimist but I knew of a similar contest that pretty nearly resulted in a church war. Both sides lost sight of the real object they were working for and the spirit of rivalry was so keen that even the SPANISH CREAM.—One half envelope Granulated Sparkling Gelatine, three cups milk, whites of three eggs, yolks of three eggs, one half cup sugar (scant), one quarter teaspoon salt and one teaspoon vanilla. Soak gelatine in one half cup milk. Scald remaining milk and pour slowly on the yolks of eggs, well beaten. Add sugar and salt and return to double boiler. Cook until mixture thickens somewhat. Remove from stove and add gelatine and whites of eggs beaten until stiff. Flavor, and turn into individual molds, first dipped in cold water, and chill. Serve with whipped cream. More gelatine will be required if large molds are used.

NUT FRAPPE.—One half envelope Granulated Sparkling Gelatine, one quarter cup cold water, one half cup sugar, one cup cooked pineapple and strawberries, one cup cream, three quarters cup of milk, white of one egg and one cup chopped nuts. Soak gelatine in the cold water five minutes and dissolve over hot water. Add dissolved gelatine to cream, milk and sugar and stir in beaten white of egg. When cold add the pineapple and strawberries which have been chopped in small pieces, also the chopped nuts. Serve ice cold in sherbet glasses.

DATE PUDDING.—One cup suet, one cup raisins, one cup molasses, one cup sweet milk, one cup walnuts, one cup dates, two and one half cups flour, one teaspoon soda: steam three hours.

BAKED SPARERIBS.—Put spareribs in cold water and let cook for almost an hour. Into a baking dish put a layer of raw sliced potatoes, then a layer of raw sliced onions. Lay the spareribs on this and finish dish with another layer of onions and the top layer of potatoes. Add enough hot water to half fill dish and bake one hour, covered the first half hour.

HAM CAKES.—Take pieces of boiled ham or smoked shoulder and chop fine. Boil potatoes and mash or use cold potatoes and chop. Take two thirds of potatoes to one third meat. Add one or two eggs (beaten), enough to make it the right consistency to shape into round, flat cakes. If too moist add a little flour. Fry in hot fat after dredging with flour. Should be seasoned to suit taste with salt and pepper. Fish cakes made in the same way are very nice. This is a good way to use up pieces of meat or fish.

PLANKED STEAK.—For the sister who asked for planked steak. This will need a plank adapted to the size of the oven, at least one inch thick. It must be of hard wood, such as oak, hickory or ash. Wipe a porterhouse or cross-cut of the rump, steam, cut one and three quarters inches thick, remove fat and broil seven minutes. Put a border of mashed, seasoned potatoes around the edge, using a pastry tube. Remove the steak to plank and bake in hot oven until steak is done and potatoes brown. Spread steak with butter, salt pepper and fine chopped parsley.

HOP up onto my lap and snuggle down close and I'll give you all a good Christmas hug. I'm going to talk about the war. "Oh, please Uncle Charlie, don't," I hear thousands of you say, "it is such an unpleasant subject, talk of something that has a little more Christmasy flavor, such as you used to do in the good old days before war broke out." Well, dearies, let me tell you something; though this is the third war Christmas we have had, and we may have two or three more before we are through, this world conflict, terrible as it is, has a wonderful side to it, a side so inspiring and sublime that I am simply carried away when I think of the good as well as the bad that has come out of it already and the glorious good that will come out of it in the future.

To me this war is something more than what the socialists think it is, the mere struggle for markets, an attempt of one group of the powers to extend its boundaries at the expense of the other group. I hate to associate the god of Love with anything that is horrible, cruel, bloody and brutal, and yet behind it all I cannot help but think at times that there is a divine influence at work. The majority of you have not sensed this influence and can see in this war nothing but its horrors, and you hate it for various reasons. It has made living more expensive. If it has not killed your relatives it has killed off some of the relatives of your friends. People will discuss it when they ought to be talking about baseball, Charlie Chaplin or the weather. War has poked its ugly nose into the movie pictures: it puts its bloody hand on the screen and you would so much rather see a picture of a white slaver carrying off a pretty country-side victim to the vice dens in the city. Then too you have heard about Zeppelins killing people in their beds, and it has just dawned on those sleepy, sluggish brains of yours that maybe the flames of that terrible conflict may leap across the ocean and you may wake up some fine morning and find a bomb has blown your head off, smashed your home to pieces and left not enough of you or your friends to make an excuse for a decent funeral.

But there is a different side to this war, a side to which few have given a thought. It is the sublime, I may say, the divine side. If you were in Europe now you would see that side. War is teaching the people of Europe the ennobling lesson of devotion, service and self sacrifice, the fundamentals of all worth-while religion. Millions of people who never did an unselfish act in their lives, drunken, sordid, selfish, miserable little human "beans" revolving like the gold fish in an eternal humdrum circle, without an idea, an ideal or a bit of imagination, a fragment of emotion or enthusiasm, have suddenly become heroes and demi-gods. The miserable little costermonger of the streets of London, the white slaver and Apache of the underworld of Paris, the dull-witted, vodka-drinking moujik of Russia, the hot-heated, stiletto-thrusting Sicilian; in fact the whole breed of men, aye and not only the men, but the women of Europe have been dragged from their narrow, selfish little ruts, and have gone forth to work or die for the causes they represent, with the courage of heroes, and the devotion of martyrs, and have laid down their lives as cheerfully as hitherto they laid down the bits of coin that brought them their daily wine or beer. All the old barriers of caste and exclusiveness have broken down in the presence of a common danger and a common ideal.

Those millions of people in Europe hitherto had never found themselves. Now by doing things for one another, working for one another giving up for one another and living lives of real devotion and self sacrifice, they have become giants where they were pigmies, men and women where they were but cash registers, money grubbers and two-legged animals. Their lives now are lives of real devotion. There is a light in their eyes that bespeaks a spirit awakened, a soul new born, and in spite of the gaps in the family circle these people are happier than they have ever been before in their lives, because at last they are really and truly alive. A new uplifting force has come into their lives and the splendor of it has transfigured them and lifted them to heights which they have never before reached. The soul and the spirit are at work. Sacrifice, devotion, service, these have made them akin to the divine. They have a religion at last that is worth while, the only religion that will save humanity, the only religion that will save you, the only religion acceptable to Christ.

Millions in the old world who had forgotten God and denied His existence are now crowding the churches with the same delight that they once crowded the theaters. Lavedan the great French journalist, one of the bitterest foes of religion, gives his experience as follows: "I once laughed at faith and thought myself wise. But as I saw France bleeding and weeping, my laughter could not give me joy. I stood by the way and saw the soldiers as they went lightheartedly to face death. I asked, what is it that makes you so? I counted the sacrifices of our people and saw how they accepted them with praying hearts. Who can hope when everything is failing save he who hath faith in God. What would become of France if her children did not believe, or her women did not pray? A vast people of the dead cover the field! How hard it is to be an atheist upon this national burying ground. I can't do it. I can't be one! I have deceived myself, and deceived you who have read my books and sung my songs. I was mad! It has all been an awful dream. Oh, France! France! return to your faith and to your best days. To depart from God is to be lost. I know not whether I shall be alive tomorrow but I must tell my friends, Lavedan does not care to die an atheist. It is not hell that makes me afraid, but this one thought grips me: God lives, and thou art so far from Him! Oh, my soul, rejoice that thou art permitted to see the hour in which, kneeling, thou hast learned to say I believe in God, I believe."

It is in times of storm and stress that men and nations feel their helplessness. They are not strong enough to stand alone. They feel the need of that support which can only come from a power that is more than human.

As I told you when this great war started, Christianity has not broken down, for Christianity has never been tried. Had there been any vast bodies of real Christians, instead of machine made, lip Christians, which the churches turn out by the millions as manufacturers turn out buttons, there would have been no war. If the church in Europe had applied the same energies towards promoting social justice as it has to booming heavenly bliss, there would have been no war. Why has the church, which could in the proper hands and inspired by a real Christian spirit, have ushered in peace and made war impossible, fallen down on its job? Listen to this and you will know. The Rev. Loomis O. Black, one of the most popular clergyman of Troy, N. Y., retired from the ministry August first, to devote his time to social work. His congregation offered to double his salary, but the golden bait had no attraction for him. He declares he never again will occupy a pulpit as a pastor. He says:

"I have been brought to take this step by the fact that the church has no definite policy, nor does it desire to have any on any of the problems before the country today. The church has absolutely no desire to wield any influence to help the common people to get fair play. It is not back of any organization of men to get their rights. The moneyed classes control the attitude of the church toward any problem. The church has no desire to have its ministers deal with any subject that is the least questionable. For instance a preacher must not preach about socialism; he must not tackle the liquor question; he must not speak of brothels. He must withdraw himself from active affairs which should claim the attention of a clergyman as well as any other man. Above all if he has ideas on social problems he must not voice them. The church is more interested in righting men's little faults and inconsistencies than in dealing with the great crimes that undermine society. The church will find fault with a vaudeville performance or a baseball game on Sunday, but it will say nothing against conditions, which year after year degrade and starve millions. The church while it is sympathetic in dealing out charity is doing absolutely nothing to remove the causes that produce these unfortunate conditions."

So much for the spiritual aspect of the great war, now for the material side. What you are most interested in is in knowing what effect this great war is going to have on Europe, politically, racially, socially, financially, etc. I will touch upon these points in another issue. Let me say however right now that there will be a new Europe after this war. The people have seen a great light and it will be impossible for the nations or the governments to go back from the state control of the many industries and public utilities, which the emergency of war made imperative. The people of Europe, and especially the people of Britain, have accomplished stupendous wonders, miracles in fact, through state organization. Marvelous efficiency has replaced the old haphazard, happy-go-lucky way of doing things. Individualism in Great Britain, as in America, had run riot, and though the freedom of the individual to do as he pleases is the very essence of liberty and democracy, it falls down and fails utterly in the presence of a great national emergency.

The war is teaching the nations of the world that only as men organize can democracy be maintained. Some day the whole world will be organized with every man upon this revolving sphere doing his part in the world's work. We are striving to reach this ideal and it will be reached in time. When the cancer begins to eat out the vitals of the human body, the surgeon applies the knife. Greed, lust, selfishness, self interest and immorality were eating out the hearts of nations. Great wealth and hideous poverty existed side by side in every land on earth. The world was sick though we did not realize it, and the knife has been applied to the cancer that was devouring it, and the putrid blood of selfishness is fast draining away from the reeking sore in which it festered and a new and healthy growth is now taking its place. The war is full of horror but it is also full of promise. In two years, woman the despised, the chattel, the slave, the breeding machine, has been forced from the seclusion of her home and has taken man's place in the industrial field, lifted his stricken body from the trenches, ministered to his needs and supplied him with the implements of war. Here war has worked a miracle that peace could not have done in a century. Woman today stands shoulder to shoulder with man. He appreciates her now at her true value, and hand in hand they will face together the problems of a new life in a new world, glorified by their mutual sacrifice, service and devotion.

After the war you will see a different world and though it may be a stricken world and drenched with blood, not one drop of that blood will have been spilled in vain. The Russian moujik who has fought on the fields of France and battled shoulder to shoulder with the democratic Briton, will spread abroad in the land of the Czar the lessons he has learned through contact with free peoples. Out of evil cometh good, and though this war has sown seeds of hate that will last for decades it has sown too, other seeds, seeds that will bring forth a harvest of democracy that will sweep thrones and dynasties from the face of the earth, blot out old wounds and animosities and weld warring nations into one brotherly whole. All things work together for righteousness, and though the pathway of progress is a pathway of thorns, at the end of it lies a golden goal which suffering humanity will eventually reach, the goal of peace and brotherhood. Every Christmas brings us nearer that goal, and though the skies are black with the clouds of war, remember it is always darkest before the dawn, and beyond those clouds which soon will clear, angel voices are once more hymning God's inspiring message: "Peace on Earth Good Will to Men."

This is my last message to you for this year. How quickly the time flies. Already nearly a fifth of the twentieth century is gone. What bright hopes we had for this century. How I envied the bright boys who were going to grow up in it, and more than one that I envied is mouldering in the dust on the battlefields of Europe. You see it doesn't pay to envy anyone—don't do it. Once more let me extend my gratitude to all those who have stood back of me in my stand for preparedness. Every vile name that malice, venom and hate could imagine has been hurled at me this year. To my amazement I found that I was a hireling of the munition makers, a traitor to the working class, a liar, scoundrel and heaven knows what else; and all because I wanted my home and the land I live in and those who are near and dear to me (including yourselves), protected from enemies without and enemies within. All I am striving for is to give those who are dreaming great dreams, an environment in which they can realize their dreams to the full, and this cannot be done in a world that is in the grip of anarchy and running red with blood, by idle talk, wild theories and piffling platitudes. We are still in the acorn stage of development, the big oak tree of brotherhood that will spring from that acron, has hardly begun to sprout. Force still dominates. Might is still right. It is because I love you and love this great country that I want you protected, so that you can live up to your ideals and realize your dreams. To those who have assailed me let me say: "Father forgive them for they know not what they do."

Send me all the loving thoughts you can on Christmas Day. Write me Christmas letters if you have the time and the inclination, for I feel closer to you at that time than any other day in the year. I cannot feast with you in person, but I can in spirit, and as in years past I will drink the health of everyone of you at one o'clock on Dec. 25th in a glass of boiled milk, and I will pray God to give you happiness for that day at least, and I trust this weary old body of mine may be spared to function for a few more years, so that I may help to guide you through those critical years of world reconstruction that lie ahead of us. God love you and bless you all.

A new correspondence list has recently been printed. League members only can secure it by sending a stamped addressed envelope.

The Christmas season will soon be here and if you haven't a set of Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books your home is not complete and you are not equipped for the full enjoyment of life. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best Christmas gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

BURNSVILLE, MISS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

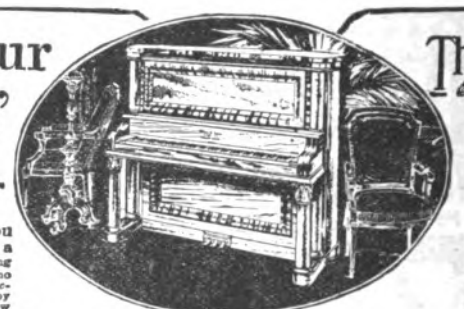
For fourteen years I have been an interested reader of the best paper ever published, COMFORT. I was six years old when COMFORT first came to our home. I am now twenty-four and have been married six years to one of the best "Johns" on earth. We have two jewels of children," a girl aged five, and a boy sixteen months old.

Uncle Charlie, I read every word you write with the greatest of interest and your understanding cannot be equaled. I do wish all the people on earth could see conditions as you do and have your views about war, the ballot and everything else for the betterment of mankind. I think like you about Lincoln, he was the greatest and best man except Jesus, ever on earth. And now Uncle Charlie, I as well as millions of others think you are our "second Lincoln" and may our Father in Heaven give you many more years of life here on earth to continue your good work. Uncle, what are the black and white plagues? I know I am ignorant and ignorance is the worst thing on earth, but I do not know and wish to know.

Uncle, my John and I think you are a hero, a good sport and a gentleman. How I do wish you were our President! What a good one you would make.

Uncle, the twenty-eighth of Feb. about ten o'clock, it was snowing, sleeting, raining, thundering, lightning and the wind blowing at the same time. Did you ever hear of the like? Some of the people around here said it was a sign that the end of time was not far off. But my I do not believe in signs. I don't think it had anything to do with the end of time, do you? Lots of the old people said they never heard of such weather before in their lives.

Do you believe the good Lord sends these awful cyclones to destroy certain people and things or is it just the works of nature? Just happens to strike certain places I suppose. My husband believes God sends such calamities to make the people quit so much wickedness. Uncle, please tell me how you understand it.



With love and best wishes to you and your "goats" an every COMFORT reader, I am your friend,

ANNIE N. SKELTON.

The black plague is caused by sexual immorality, and its effect on both the guilty and the innocent, the rich and the poor throughout society is simply murderous; for its evil effects are carried from one generation to another, leaving behind a trail of ruined lives and broken hearts in its deadly pathway. One out of every seven cases of insanity in this state is caused by syphilis, otherwise known as black plague. In the state of New York, paresis due to the black plague slays as many people as typhoid fever, and more than scarlet fever. One man in every nine between the ages of forty and sixty years of age dies of paresis, commonly referred to as softening of the brain. The black plague is responsible for one fourth of the feeble-minded children in institutions. Because immorality cannot be stopped is no reason why we should permit this hideous disease to continue its horrible ravages and bring misery and death to tens of thousands of humans, many of them innocent victims of the vileness of others. In New Zealand, the most progressive country in the world, they are taking drastic measures to stamp out the black plague. They are going to do it, no matter who is hurt or who suffers. Science by testing the blood, which the black plague poisons, can quickly detect the presence of this disease in the human system. The agitation in so many states for a clean bill of health from a competent physician to all those contemplating matrimony, is a measure largely directed at the black plague. If the blood of the nation can be kept pure and wholesome and especially free from venereal or black plague infection, half the diseases from which humanity now suffers, will vanish, and we shall all be well on the way to that goal desired by all, when we shall have healthy bodies and healthy minds. The ravages of the black plague in England have been so great that a royal commission was recently appointed to thoroughly investigate the subject. The report which is an appalling document has just been handed in, and when the great war is out of the way, Great Britain will take steps, just as we shall do in a few years from now, to wrestle with this monstrous evil. As long as society adheres to its present wicked, double standard of morals, ostracizing the female sinner and lionizing the male debaucher, the black plague will continue to flourish. The conscience of the nation thank heaven, is being slowly aroused. Disease and ignorance are twin brothers, and women are refusing longer to remain ignorant of matters that vitally concern their health and their happiness. The ballot will give women a voice in public affairs, will give them power to protect their own vital interests. Once we have a thinking nation and universal suffrage will stimulate the brain cells and start women thinking, we shall be well on the road to getting a moral nation, and a moral nation will mean a healthy nation, and when we get a healthy, moral nation, there will be a single standard of morals instead of a double one and the black plague will be largely a thing of the past. If the governments of the earth were as careful about protecting health as they are property and trade, the world would soon be a paradise. The man who commits murder as a rule slays but one, the man who transmits disease, slays scores, and projects endless suffering into the future. Disease breeds ignorance and ignorance breeds disease. Let us get rid of both. The white plague is consumption, called tuberculosis by the doctors. Everybody knows what that is, as it is so common. It was formerly considered incurable, but is curable if given the right treatment in time as mentioned in COMFORT'S November editorial. No dear friend, I don't believe that God sends cyclones to destroy anybody for if God did that He would not be God but a wholesale murderer. Nature has its periods of calm and storm, and in this respect is like ourselves, very human. Man eventually will control the tempest just as he now controls the automobile that he guides through the city streets. Nature is a stern old mother. If she coddles you one minute she is liable to spank you the next, but no matter how hard she hits, man's indomitable spirit is only strengthened by the chastening and rises superior to every calamity. That shows the God in him. If we had everything our own way and had things too easy, with our present mental and spiritual development, which is not

Money in Early Broilers

A DISTINCT branch of the poultry business, and one that is extremely profitable for those who can run it successfully, is raising young chicks in the winter for early broilers. To commence on a large scale requires a large capital, but there are hundreds of men and women who have accommodations on their premises that would enable them to start in a small way, and by investing the profits from the first year they could obtain a really good equipment for the business.

The up-to-date broiler plant consists of an incubator cellar, a nursery, or brooder house, as it is usually called, and a broiler house. Both the latter are divided into small pens, about two feet wide and five feet long. In the nursery house the top ends of the pens are enclosed like boxes to the depth of about a foot and a half, and have hot water pipes running through them to furnish heat for the chicks to brood under. The brooder house is divided in the same way, but the hot water pipes only run around the walls of the house, as the birds don't need the immediate heat to brood under, after they leave the nursery, when they are five or six weeks old.

But, until you can afford the proper equipment, one or two incubators can be run in the cellar of the house or an unused room where there is no other heat. Individual brooders can be used instead of the nursery and brooder house if you have any light outbuilding to stand them in. In fact, I like the individual brooders better for the nursery period than the pipe-house system, because it is only necessary to heat as many as are needed, and with the pipe system the entire house has to be heated, even if you are only going to use one system.

Most of the different makes of brooders on the market are made with two compartments: A chamber with a round hover, which is heated with a lamp, and an outer compartmen for exercise and feeding. The average price is nine dollars, and the machines are supposed to hold one hundred chickens, but seventy-five are quite enough, and even that number should be decreased to fifty the second week and twenty-five the fourth week—that is, if the chicks are to be confined entirely to the brooder. But if it stands in a warm room, where a small outer enclosure can be made on the floor of the house for a playroom, fifty chicks can be carried through to the squab broiler age in one brooder.

Wyandotte chickens when hatched will weigh two ounces. If all goes well, they should gain two ounces during the first ten days; four ounces for the third week; another two ounces in the fourth week, and at the end of the eighth week they should weigh two pounds.

The entire life of a chicken intended for a broiler is so artificial that few if any of the rules for raising ordinary chicks can be applied to them. The great aim is to develop them as quickly as possible, for to get the best price, a broiler must grow quickly and be plump.

Like all newly hatched birds, they must have nothing to eat for the first thirty-six hours. After that, commercial chick feed (which is a mixture of all sorts of small seeds and cracked grains) should be their sole diet for ten days.

When there are small quantities of chicks to feed, and cash is of more value than time, it will be cheaper to mix the feed at home. Take one quart each of finely cracked corn, bran and hulled oats; mix with the same quantity of golden millet, Kafir corn and very sharp, fine gravel, crushed charcoal and finely chopped clover hay. Mix thoroughly, then pass through a fine sieve, to insure there being no large pieces of corn or oats for the babies to choke themselves with. For the three days they are confined to the hover department, put a small pan filled with the mixture in each corner, and, instead of water, fill a small drinking fountain with milk which has been scalded and allowed to cool. Leave it with them for ten or fifteen minutes, at morning, noon, and again at about 3 p. m. It must not be allowed to remain all the time, because the heat from the hover will turn it sour.

After they are allowed access to the outer compartment, mixed grain can be scattered on the cut hay (or whatever is used to cover the floor) so that the chicks will have to scratch, which compels them to take enough exercise for healthy growth. The plan is to feed little and often. The milk can be allowed to stand in the outer compartment, but the fountain must be thoroughly cleansed and scalded every day.

After the tenth day, the door of the outer compartment can be opened and the chicks given further liberty, if there is a stove in the building to warm the atmosphere; but if there is not, don't let them out of the brooder until they are four weeks old. In either case their diet must be slightly changed after the tenth day. Steam some of the chopped clover hay—about a quart—and add one pint of coarse corn-meal, one pint of ground oats and half a small cupful of chopped liver which has been boiled for five minutes (raw liver is too strong for young birds, and it should not be boiled for more than five minutes). Feed once a day at noon. Put the mash into two or three dishes, so they can all get a chance to eat at once. Remove any that is left at the end of ten minutes. If it is not possible to get fresh liver, use one teaspoonful of beef meal or any of the commercial meat preparations which are ground fine. Continue to scatter the dry grains three times a day.

When they are four weeks old, give mash twice a day about 9 a. m. and 2 p. m., increasing the allowance of meat slightly; and if you have plenty of skim-milk, make cottage cheese and give it to them as an extra once or twice a week. From the fourth week keep a pan containing grit and charcoal always before them. After they are six weeks old increase the quantity of corn-meal in the mash, and correspondingly decrease the ground oats until all corn-meal and no oats are being used. Also, stop steaming the clover and mix it dry with the other ingredients; then moisten mash in scalded milk in which suet has been boiled (one pound of chopped suet to four quarts of milk.) Boil for fifteen minutes. Feed it three times a day—9 a. m., 12 m. and 3 p. m. The last two weeks before killing omit all dry grain; feed nothing but mash, made as before, only as soft as possible without being sloppy. Feed four times a day all they will eat in ten minutes, but on no account leave food before them longer than that, or they will become satiated. Birds pushed along should be in fine condition for market when from ten to twelve weeks old.

Our broilers are never given water to drink, but always scalded milk. Scalded milk invariably checks any tendency toward bowel trouble, and is also a strong factor in making the flesh tender and juicy.

Correspondence

J. A. W.—As you found the broken egg in the bird, and the hen's breast was bruised, it is safe to conclude that the hen's death was caused through injury. It is just possible that a coon or fox may take the hens when on wide range. Sometimes a young dog is answerable for such injuries, and frequently a new horse or cow may kick hens that may run around their feet. Try and discover how the birds got hurt, and take means to save others from suffering in a like way. Such cases can be cured if treated at once. A bird with any obstruction or inflammation of the egg passage usually has a drooping appearance. Wings and tail sag slightly, and if you pick up a suspicious looking bird and examine the vent, it will be found hot and in constant motion. Young pullets and overfed hens are apt to get in this condition when they first commence to lay, and of course any kick or injury that breaks the unshelled egg in the intestines is sure to cause inflammation of the egg duct. The best treatment is to insert a small syringe or a stiff feather saturated with olive oil into the vent. If a feather is used, turn gently before removing. Keep the bird in a small coop, and watch the results, repeating the treatment every hour. If it is a case of being egg bound, it will help the egg to pass down and out; and if it is a ruptured egg, there will be some trace of the egg to be seen somewhere around the vent within a short time after using the oil. A broken egg creates acute inflammation, and if it is not removed, acts as a poison to the whole system. After four or five hours' treatment with the plain oil in cases of a broken egg, a small syringe must be filled with a weak solution of carbolic acid (or some other good disinfectant) and warm oil. Insert it into the vent, which must be thoroughly sprayed. Give two 20-grain doses of sulphate of magnesia to cleanse the intestines. Every care should be taken to remove every trace of the broken egg, and to thoroughly cleanse the passage; but if it is neglected, vent-gleet is very likely to develop and spread through the entire flock.

W. H.—Follow the instructions for winter feeding which have appeared in recent numbers of COMFORT.

F. K.—No; I don't think condensed milk would be a satisfactory food for young turkeys. If on free range, they will pick up enough insects and weeds for the first two or three weeks. If confined to yards, feed sour milk and curd cheese or custard, and very little grain until five weeks old.

F. E. D.—I have not experienced such trouble as you describe with capons. Air puff (or to give it its correct name, emphysema), is caused by some injury to the lungs or lung tissues. Perhaps you bound the birds too tightly while you were operating on them. If not too severely hurt, time will effect a cure. After caponizing, birds should be kept quiet in small quarters and fed lightly on stale bread which has been soaked in milk and squeezed dry, or very small quantities of finely ground oats and corn made into a mash.

F. R. W.—If the turkeys are to run at large, ten hens to one gobbler. If, however, you keep a gobbler confined to a good-sized yard, and turn in one hen a day you can keep from fifteen to twenty hen turkeys.

S. W. W.—Unless a brick henhouse was very well constructed and ventilated, there is danger of its being damp, and of imperceptible drafts developing in a short time. Personally, I consider lumber, covered with good roofing paper, the most satisfactory henhouse one can have.

J. E. W.—Pullets that are about to lay, and old hens that are just through moulting, frequently go on to the nest and come off without laying, for a few days before settling down to produce eggs.

R. M. G.—If you observe strict cleanliness in the house you can keep twenty-five hens successfully through the winter on a floor space of ten by sixteen feet. The American Standard of Perfection gives full descriptions of every breed and variety of fowl.

M. C. B.—The coloring of Partridge Wyandottes is as follows: Male bird; head and back, dark red; neck and saddle, red with distinct black stripes down each feather, tapering to a point near the end of the feather. Breast, greenish black; body and fluff, black or slightly tinged with red. Tail, glossy, greenish black. Beak, dark horn, shading to yellow at tip. Shanks and feet, yellow. Face, wattles, earlobes and comb, all bright red. Weight, eight and one half pounds. Hen, five and one half pounds; cockerels, seven and one half pounds; pullets, five and one half pounds. The plumage of the Barred Plymouth Rocks is bluish gray, with narrow parallel lines of bluish black. Face, comb, wattles, earlobes, all bright red, and weigh one pound more than Wyandottes. There are also buff and white varieties of Plymouth Rocks. I cannot recommend breeders or give prices of stock and eggs in this column.

R. L. H.—From the fact that you say there is a very disagreeable odor on the bird's breath, it is safe to say that they are suffering from very malignant roup. Roup is a contagious disease, so the whole place must be thoroughly cleaned and disinfected. Better kill and burn the carcases of every bird that is badly affected. Wash feed pans and water dishes in strong soda and boiling water. If the house has an earthern floor, scrub off about an inch of the surface, burn, and fill in with fresh material. Give the whole house—walls, ceiling, perches and nest boxes—a thorough sluicing with whitewash which has been mixed with scalded milk, and two ounces of carbolic acid and half a cup of salt added to each pailful. Use raw mixture quite hot, and don't spare it. Swish lots of it into all corners, cracks and crevices, and if it is possible, keep the birds out of the house for twenty-four hours, and scatter quicklime over the floor; of course being careful to cover it all up before the birds are let into the house again. Put a teaspoonful of kerosene oil into every quart of drinking water for the general flock as a preventive. Don't slight the work, for now is the most important time of the year. If your stock gets sick and out of condition, the results will show when it comes to the hatching season. Look over the poultry-house and see if there is not some knothole or crack in the neighborhood of the perches which needs covering up. It is usually some such unsuspected draft which causes common cold that is apt to develop into roup and become epidemic. Birds that show signs of cold, running eyes, cough or sneezing, should be at once confined to a quarantine coop. Place in a warm sheltered outhouse far from the usual poultry quarters, and treat as follows: Fill a syringe with a solution of permanganate of potassium, or any good disinfectant, and thoroughly spray the bird's throat, mouth, nostrils and eyes. If you have no syringe, bathe with the mixture, then use the tip of a stiff wing feather in the throat and nostrils.

B. F. C.—The first hen had what is known as keratitis, which usually develops from a catarrhal inflammation of the mucus membrane about the eyes. The first symptoms are the eyelids growing together, and bubbles of pus, visible when the eye is open. Later, a small white ulcer may be seen on the pupil. As soon as any of these symptoms are noticed, put ten drops of tincture of pulsatila in each pint of drinking water. Bathe the eyes with a weak solution of peroxide, and then anoint the lids with an ointment made of ten grains of finely powdered iodoform in one ounce of vaseline. Cleanse the nostrils and roof of mouth with warm water, then mix equal parts of pulverized camphor, boric acid, and subnitrate of bismuth, and blow a little of the mixture through a straw into the nostrils and the cleft in the roof of the mouth. Keep the sufferers in a small coop while treating, and feed lightly on strengthening food. Poorly ventilated houses or exposure to storms are usually the cause of eye troubles, but frequently they develop in conjunction with an attack of roup.

A. F.—Unless the weather was very wet or very hot when the second lot of chickens were hatched, it seems as if the fault must rest with the parent stock, as you say they received the same feed and general care as the first hatch did. Chickens hatched from eggs laid by hens that were out of condition, or running with too few male birds, are apt to be wanting in constitutional strength, and gradually weaken when it comes to the strain of growing and feathering. There is really nothing to be done in such cases, and it is a blessing when they die, for if they do survive, they are never profitable, and if used as brooders, their progeny will have still less vitality and strength.

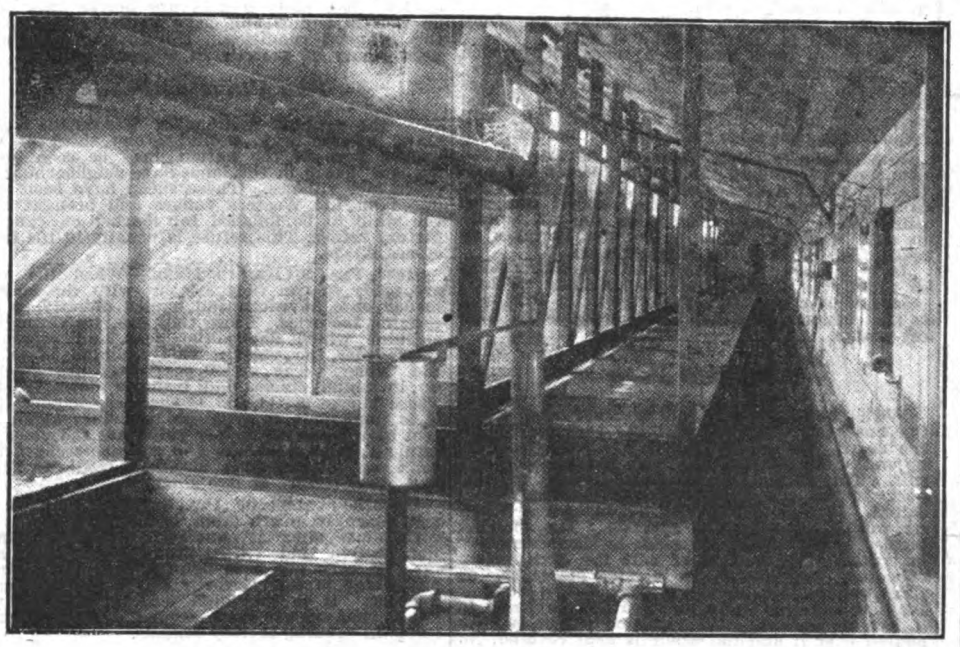
E. J. T.—Tools for caponizing can be bought at most poultry supply houses or stores that carry agricultural implements.

B. S.—Unless the sleeping quarters are kept very dry, and the ducks are given plenty of clean, dry litter to sleep on, they are very likely to develop rheumatism. Another cause of leg weakness and rheumatism with ducks confined to small quarters, is the want of green vegetable food, which should form at least two thirds of their rations. Rub the shanks and feet with a mixture of sweet oil and turpentine.

O. B. W.—Partridge Wyandottes are good general purpose fowls, for, like all other varieties of Wyandottes, they are good winter layers, and dress well for the table either as chickens or mature birds. Rhode Island Reds are also what are known as general purpose birds and weigh about the same as Wyandottes.

B. E.—The crest and wattles are a little larger on the male Guinea fowl. He also carries his body more upright than the hen, and the cry is different. The females seem to repeat "buckwheat," or "come back," in a monotonous tone. The male makes a sort of chuddering noise, ending with a high note.

G. A. D.—It would not be detrimental to future stock to mate one of the cockerels with the pullets, but as they are not very strong in characteristic points of the other variety, I advise you to sell some of the cockerels you have raised, and get a single comb rooster to mate with the pullets, for by that means you will be more likely to get a high percentage of single comb chicks. Yes; Buff Orpingtons can be bred to lay as many eggs as Rhode Island Reds. Remember always that feed and general care have as much to do with the bird's productive powers as their breed or variety.



F. M. F.—The birds must have chicken pox. Rub the sores with carbolic vaseline. Feed a mash composed of two thirds chopped clover which has been steamed for several hours. Read answer to B. F. C., in this issue, and if the eyes are affected, use the same treatment as recommended in that case.

F. D.—The American Standard of Perfection, which is an authority accepted and used by all judges at poultry shows, says the Barred Plymouth Rocks (males) should have yellow beaks; females, yellow, or yellow with slightly dark stripings, so there is no occasion to object to your birds or doubt their being thoroughbreds. (2) It is against the rules to answer such questions through the mail.

W. M. B.—If you will write again, telling me what birds you are interested in, I will try and help you.

C. B.—You will find directions and advice for feeding hens in the winter, little chicks and growing stock, in this department as the different seasons come round. Look through the last few issues of COMFORT about feeding for winter eggs. It is much better not to give medicine unless birds develop some special disease. Keep them free from lice; provide a dry, draft proof house for them to sleep in, and keep it clean, and the floor deeply covered with litter for them to scratch in on stormy days when they can't get out, and they are not likely to want much doctoring. Leghorns are supposed to produce the most eggs, and Wyandottes and Rhode Island Reds are good winter layers, and more profitable than Leghorns as table birds.

F. E.—Worms don't particularly injure fowls unless they are very numerous, but of course it is better to get rid of them before they multiply, and you can be pretty sure that the whole flock needs attention after what you have found in those you killed. By means of a medicine dropper, give each bird from twenty to thirty drops of turpentine and olive oil mixed in equal parts. The dose should be administered in the morning whilst the birds are fasting. Two hours later give them a mash of ground oats and corn, moistened with Castor oil; spread mash out on long boards, so that each bird is likely to get an equal share. Keep the birds confined to the house for half an hour, then let them out, sweep out all the droppings and burn. Repeat the treatment after a week has elapsed, and you can feel pretty sure that the birds are free from the unwelcome intruders. Worms don't really affect the flesh of the bird, but of course the idea of eating them is repulsive, and if they should become very numerous, they will deplete the bird's strength and health to such an extent that they will not be fit for food.

Cause and Effect

"Now you see how nice I look; but you don't know how nice I feel. I'm what Mamma calls 'the Effect.'

"What do you think is the 'Cause'?

"Mamma says it's Fels-Naptha soap, the wonder-worker that keeps me and all the rest of the house, inside and out, in apple-pie trim, WITHOUT ANY FUSS ABOUT IT!"

Fels-Naptha does work wonders all by itself, if set properly to its duties according to the directions on the wrapper.

The daintiest wear of the daintiest little maiden, and also the rougher operations of house-cleaning, it's all the same.

Fels-Naptha is an all-'round household cleanser, yet strangely enough some people think it useful for one thing only—the one they happened first to have used it for!

Wherever soap is used—use Fels-Naptha and get the benefit of its great value for yourself. Use it the better, easier, quicker, cheaper way. Use it the Fels-Naptha way.

Fels-Naptha, 10 bars in carton, or by single bar.

The MODERN FARMER

This department, which is conducted by eminent specialists and experts in the various branches of agricultural science and practical, business farming, will keep our readers posted on the latest scientific discoveries and teach them the best methods of operating in order to obtain GREATER FARM PROFITS AND BETTER HOME LIVING.

Any COMFORT subscriber can have the advice of our Agricultural Staff free on questions relating to farming, live stock and dairying. The answers will be printed in this department and will be interesting and instructive to all who are concerned in farming.

Write your questions plainly on one side of the paper only; give your full name and address, and direct your letter to COMFORT'S MODERN FARMER, Augusta, Maine.

Finishing Pigs for Market

IT is well to remember that the youngest pork is the cheapest pork and that the fattest hogs are the most expensive. This is only another way of stating two facts that should be constantly kept in mind by the feeder of hogs, viz.:

1. The older the hog the more feed it takes to make a pound of gain.

2. The longer the feeding period the more feed it takes to make a pound of gain.

The above facts have been repeatedly proven by experiment stations and by expert feeders; hence the farmer should depend on young hogs for his market pork. These should be finished as rapidly as possible and as soon as they will command a good price rushed to the market.

PORK MADE IN COLD WEATHER COSTLY.—It seldom pays to prolong the feeding period far into the winter. Pork made at this time is costly for three reasons,—the two stated above, and the third one that hogs cannot lay on fat rapidly in cold weather. This is because it takes so much feed to keep the animals warm.

It is usually the wisest plan to fatten hogs as rapidly as possible and then dispose of them before winter sets in. Pork made in this way is the cheapest pork and hence returns the largest profits.

Pickled Pork

With the coming of cold weather also comes the butchering of pigs and the preservation of the meat. The usual way is to stack the sides up on a shelf, salting each piece heavily with dry salt. This is the poorest possible way to keep pork for the reason that it cannot be uniformly salted. It taints, rusts and molds. A much better way is to pack it in a pickle. The simplest pickle for this purpose is made by dissolving salt in water,—two pounds of salt for each gallon of water. The meat is cut in small pieces, two or three pounds in a piece, and packed in a crock or jar that has been thoroughly scalded, as firmly as it can be packed. The brine or pickle is then poured over it and the whole is kept covered. No meat must show above the brine. If during the winter the meat should show the least traces of being "off flavor" the brine should be removed, the meat washed in clean, cold water and a new brine prepared and poured over as before.

SWEET PICKLE FOR PORK.—If it is desired to smoke the bacon or hams, a good sweet pickle for this purpose is made as follows:

Two pounds of brown sugar, eight pounds of salt, two ounces of saltpeter for each 100 pounds of meat.

Dissolve the sugar, salt and saltpeter in two or three gallons of boiling water and cool to room temperature. Pack the meat in a scalded jar as before and when the "pickle" is thoroughly cool pour over the meat exactly as in the use of brine. Add enough boiled and cooled water to cover. Never put pickle on hot.

SUGAR CURED HAMS AND BACON.—After five or six weeks hams and shoulders will be sufficiently cured to smoke. Bacon will cure in three or four weeks. Remove from pickle, drain and smoke with cobs or hickory wood. If it is desired to keep this meat for several months, smoke for four or five days or even longer. If at any time before meat is ready to smoke there are any indications of spoiling, drain off pickle and boil it over again, skimming off any scum that may come to the surface. Meantime rinse meat with cold water, scald jar thoroughly and replace. After pickle is thoroughly cooled pour over meat as before.

SWEET CORNED BEEF.—The same pickle can be used for beef, only the amount of salt should be reduced to six or seven pounds instead of eight. The beef, from which most of the bone should be removed, should be packed in scalded jars just the same as the pork, and the prepared and cooled pickle poured over it. If the pickle is removed and boiled over occasionally, the meat rinsed and the jar scalded and cooled before repacking, and the cooled pickle poured over it as at first, beef can be kept sweet and wholesome all winter in this pickle.

DRIED BEEF.—After beef has been in the above pickle three or four weeks it will make the finest kind of dried beef. Simply remove from pickle, hang up and drain, smoke for two days over cobs or hickory wood and hang up near the stove to dry. When so cured beef will keep indefinitely.

Exercise in Snow Time

When passing through Canada one is surprised to see no animals in the yards or paddocks. In that country it does not seem to be the general practise to make every animal take outdoor exercise every day in winter and with us many stockmen do not like to turn their animals out when the snow is deep. It has been found that every time dairy cows are turned outdoors for exercise in cold weather that there is a shrink in milk which in some instances amounts to several pounds. That is the reason the cows are not turned out and it is not uncommon, in some districts, for dairy cows to be kept indoors the year round. That practise, in our opinion, is absolutely wrong. It is true that a small shrink in milk takes place when cows leave a hot stable and stay out in the yard for half an hour or so, and especially so if they are allowed to drink ice water from a tank; but there is little if any shrink in the long run if cow stables are kept down in temperature to not over 50 degrees and if the cows are out every day the year round. If the record of the two herds is kept the none exercised ones may make the most milk and butterfat in the year, but the gain will be far less than some people expect and it may be altogether offset by detriment to the health. Out-door exercise is absolutely necessary to good health and for the sake of the unborn calf. Gradually but surely the health of a herd will be undermined by in-door life and lack of exercise. In such a herd tuberculosis will be liable to run riot if it finds entrance and that is true of other contagious diseases. Such diseases are very largely the penalty of pampering and the man who nurtures and maintains strong constitution and resistant powers in his cows will be the most successful dairyman and have comparatively little trouble from disease.

By all means see that every animal has some outdoor exercise every day in snowtime and plenty of fresh air in the stable. Slight shrink in milk will be more than made up for by good health and, in the long run, cow compared with cow, the exercised ones will prove most profitable. Sheep should be out every day in winter and have a shed or well ventilated stable to run to when the weather is inclement. They should be kept dry and if then well exercised and so fed that their bowels are active they will do well in winter and come to the lambing season in good condition. Horses and hogs also need plenty of exercise in winter time.

Pea Vines as Feed

the canning sections of Wisconsin, which state, by the way, produces one third of the canned peas of the nation, may be seen great flocks of sheep in the immediate neighborhood of cities and villages. These sheep have been produced on the Western ranges and brought into the state to be finished for market on canning factory refuse. This refuse is usually in the form of pea silage.

HOW PEA SILAGE IS MADE.—When the peas are ready to can they are cut with the mower, loaded onto hayracks and hauled directly to the canning factories. There they are run through a machine which shells the peas and separates them from the vines. This machine is called the "viner." The green pea vines are stacked up in round stacks and tramped down solidly. These stacks settle and become so compact that it is impossible to separate the vines again except by the use of the hay knife, but the vines retain all their greenness and succulent character. This pea silage makes excellent feed for sheep and other classes of live stock.

FEEDING VALUE OF PEA SILAGE.—One ton of pea silage is worth from two to three tons of corn silage since it contains about three times the protein and twice the carbohydrates and fat. If corn silage is figured at $4.00 per ton, pea silage is easily worth $10.00 for the same purpose. It is this high feeding value of pea silage that makes sheep feeding especially profitable in canning factory regions.

County Fair Exhibits

The "Fair" season is over and the exhibits that we have seen are still fresh in our minds. The student of better agriculture is impressed with the unused opportunity to teach better farming at these fairs. A few instances will serve to illustrate this point.

Quality—Not Size—Important

The average exhibitor, and many of the judges too, for that matter, pay too much attention to size—too little to quality. The biggest melons, the longest ears of corn, the largest apples, the heaviest hogs, too often carry off the blue ribbons. This sets up wrong standards and hurts rather than helps agriculture.

The big melon may be coarse and unpalatable or a poor shipper. Even though it is of good quality it is ordinarily a poor seller because of its size. The average customer does not care to pay the price. The largest potatoes are seldom in demand on the market and usually very low in quality. Besides they are often hollow. The longest ears of corn seldom have a high proportion of shelled corn to cob; hence are unprofitable for the farmer to raise. The biggest apples, like the largest potatoes, do not sell well and in most cases are of poor quality. The heaviest hogs are usually coarse, poor breeders, do not bring the best prices and in the end cost more per hundred weight to produce. For these reasons less importance should be attached to size and more attention should be paid to quality.

Uniformity Desirable

In a well-selected sample all the units are of the same size. Every housewife knows that big and little potatoes do not bake evenly in the oven or boil at the same rate in the pot. This is true with every kind of fruit or vegetable which is cooked for the table; hence uniformity of size stands next to quality. This is likewise true of all exhibits composed of several individuals. We like to see a uniform litter of pigs, or a bunch of lambs all of the same size. Both experience and scientific investigation have proven these to be the most profitable.

There are ordinarily too many premiums offered on the county fair lists,—that is, premiums are given on too many varieties. Many of these varieties cannot be profitably grown in the county where the fair is located and for this reason they should not be encouraged. County fair officers should pay more attention to the make-up of the premium lists. They should learn if possible the most profitable breeds and varieties produced in their counties and pay the highest premiums on these.

New and untried varieties should be recognized but those that have proven themselves unprofitable should be dropped off the premium lists.

These simple rules may help to improve the usefulness of county fair exhibits:

1. Select the best in quality, not the largest in size.

2. In collective exhibits aim to get all units of the same size and shape. The medium size is usually preferred.

3. Exhibit only those breeds and varieties that may be grown with profit.

Keeping Milk and Cream for Home Use

Many people who buy small quantities of milk from the milkman complain when it does not keep and put the blame on the farmer who produced it. This is entirely unfair until the purchaser himself is sure that it is not his own fault.

There are three chief reasons for the souring of milk, viz: Careless handling, the use of unsterile milk vessels and high temperatures. Any one of these may cause milk to spoil after it leaves the hands of the milkman.

WHAT THE PATRON SHOULD DO.—When the milk is delivered the patron should see that it is placed in a thoroughly scalded vessel. It will not do to use a simple clean vessel washed in the ordinary way. It must be scalded with boiling hot water, then allowed to cool before the milk is placed in it.

After this the milk must be kept cool. No one should expect to keep milk sweet longer than twelve hours without an ice box, except in the winter time when it may be kept in a window box. Even then it may develop a bitter instead of a sour taste. To keep milk sweet it should be handled with great care. It must always be poured from the scalded vessel into which it was placed on receipt from the milkman. It may not be dipped with a cup or a spoon except these have been scalded with the same care as was used for the original vessel.

HOW TO SWEETEN SOUR MILK.—Milk that is just turning sour, that is, that has just begun to smell or taste sour, may be sweetened by using a pinch of baking soda or saleratus, as it is often called. A very small pinch should be placed on the tip of a spoon and stirred into the milk. More soda should be added in this same way, a pinch at a time, until the milk loses its sour taste. If used immediately this will answer every purpose of perfectly sweet milk.

HOW TO KEEP MILK A LONG TIME.—Milk may be kept for several days by pasteurization. This simply means heating the milk to one hundred and fifty degrees F., holding it there for ten minutes and then cooling it as quickly as possible. The easy way to do this is to place the milk in a small vessel and set this into another vessel containing water. Place this over a fire and bring the water in the outer vessel to near boiling, stirring the milk in the inner vessel occasionally. When a scum begins to form over the milk or steam begins to rise from it, remove both from the fire, leave the milk in the hot water for five minutes longer, remove and cool quickly by placing in a vessel of cold water. Either milk or cream may be so treated and will keep for several days after such treatment, with ordinary care.

Milk or cream that has begun to turn sour may be sweetened by the use of soda and then pasteurized as described above. After being sweetened and pasteurized it may also be kept for several days and will answer every purpose for which sweet milk or cream is used.

CONDENSED MILK.—Condensed milk is nothing more nor less than evaporated milk. It has been heated and a portion of the water it contains driven off. It is then placed in cans and sealed up, in which form it will keep for an indefinite period. When opened for use water should be added to restore that driven off by evaporation. Conensed milk will answer every purpose for which whole milk is used and is finding widespread popularity.

Don't Forget the Farm Machinery

Winter is at hand. Where is the faithful old binder, or the corn plow? Out in the field! Well, it shouldn't be there, it can't stand the cold, the winds, the rain, the snow and the frost and do a good job next year. It is a well-worn saying among machinery dealers that "More farm machinery rusts out than wears out." Winter weather is hardest of all on farm machinery. No farmer can any more afford to let his machinery stand out unhoused than he can his stock.

Before storing, all machinery should be cleaned and all metal parts oiled to prevent rust and insure good running next year.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming.

Questions and Answers

LIMING ALFALFA LAND.—I notice that you advise using lime on land devoted to Alfalfa; but I did not know about this when I seeded a small field to Alfalfa in August. Would it be all right to put the lime on now? Also would it be well to manure the land this winter?
B. N. H., Ohio.

A.—It is best to put the ground limestone rock on the new plowed land and then work it thoroughly into the surface soil, just before seeding. Two tons to the acre may be used, if the soil is acid, as shown by testing with litmus paper and one ton of lime, to the acre may be used on general principles, if it can be had cheap enough to warrant the outlay. Even a thousand pounds of ground limestone will do some good, and if the land has long been used for corn or other grain production a ton of ground phosphate rock would help mightily. As you have not used these fertilizers it would be all right to top dress the field with well-rotted mixed horse and cow manure, to which add ground phosphate rock at the rate of at least 70 pounds to the load and apply with manure spreader when the land is frozen sufficiently to prevent wheel cutting and hoof treading. Just before thawing out in spring top dress with ground limestone rock and if you have not already put on some sweet clover soil to inoculate the soil for Alfalfa do so in spring, sowing at least 500 pounds by hand, on each acre.

OX WARBLE GRUBS.—Does the fly that causes grubs in the backs of cattle deposit her eggs in the skin of the infested places? Some say yes, but I saw an article the other day claiming that the eggs are laid on the heels and swallowed by the cattle. How may the grubs be prevented?
M. A., Pa.

A.—The old idea was that the ox warble fly deposited her eggs in the skin of the loins; but it has been shown that the fly has no egg depositor to make this possible, nor has she the power of penetrating the skin in any way. The modern belief, of investigating scientists, is that the fly lays her eggs upon the hair for the heels and legs; that these eggs are licked off and swallowed; that the hatched larvæ (minute) burrow through the wall of the gullet (esophagus), get into the connective tissue and burrow and work their way under the skin until they arrive at the loins or along the backbone at one point or another. Here they mature, puncture the skin for breathing purposes and finally emerge though the opening, drop to the ground, burrow there and finally issue as flies to carry on the pestiferous work of their kind. We have seen sausage casings, made from the gullet, that showed numerous warble grubs in the embryo stage of development. To prevent warble trouble use fly repellants on cattle in summer and wash the backs of the cattle with strong salt water in early winter; then apply oil freely to forming warbles. Adult warbles should be squeezed out and destroyed.

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

Milady's Eyebrow

"WHY," says Mary Elizabeth to me, in a nice little likable letter,—"why do I always look as if I were scowling, when I'm not at all? And there isn't even a wrinkle in my forehead, yet I always look as if I were 'knitting my brows.' What is the matter,—do you know?"

That gives me something quite worth while to talk about to my girls this month, for it happens that I do know just what is Mary Elizabeth's trouble. If Mary Elizabeth will look in her mirror—and if you will, Kate—and if you will, Edna—you will find that the frown is all in your eyebrows.

"In your eyebrows?" Yes, for I am absolutely sure that your eyebrows meet over your nose. Nothing else in the world (except real wrinkly creases in the forehead) can make one look as if scowling, when one's heart and mind are in the most cheerful of moods.

Eyebrows, you see, aren't such unimportant features as we sometimes think. And as for Mary Elizabeth, and Kate, and Edna—and all the rest of my girls who find on looking in the glass that their eyebrows have walked halfway to meet each other on the bridge of the nose—reach for the tweezers at once! I don't recommend tweezers for removing superfluous hair, except over the nose, and, occasionally where there is one isolated hair growing elsewhere on the face. But for meeting eyebrows, the tweezers are probably the best remedy.

USE AN EYEBROW BRUSH TO REMOVE POWDER, BRUSHING THE BROWS THE WRONG WAY.

Clip them tight at the very root of each hair, and give a quick firm jerk, so root and all will come out instead of the hair breaking off even with the skin.

Clear the bridge thoroughly while you are about it, then use a bit of cotton and mop the skin at that point with ammonia or alcohol, being sure to squeeze the cotton fairly dry and to keep the eyes tightly closed, for you mustn't let even the tiniest bit of the liquid get in the eyes. After the ammonia bath has entirely dried, lay a hot wet cloth over the eyes and brows, and when cool replace with another, continuing for five minutes. Then rub in a little cold cream very gently indeed.

Will the hairs come back? Yes, they will. And your only remedy will be to use the tweezers again—and even again, as needed.

Girls, while we are talking about eyebrows, do let me caution you about the use of powder. Even girls otherwise careful about their toilet, seem to think nothing at all of powdering the face hastily in and out of season, at home and abroad, the eyebrows coming in for a fair share, and, in spite of a careless rubbing, looking always a little powdery and unclean.

When you powder your face, use an eyebrow brush and get every bit of the powder out of the brows. To do this, do not brush the brows the way the hairs lay, but against the hairs—toward the nose. Brush hard and vigorously, toward the nose and up and down. By this method you will get every bit of powder out,—and produce two terribly towsly brows!

But they are not a permanent feature, so do not be dismayed, for, once the powder is out, wield your eyebrow brush again,and brush gently and carefully away from the nose, making every hair lay just where it should, and shaping the brow to the best of your ability. Brush until the brow is satiny-smooth.

If your eyebrows are dry and scanty, use a little warm olive oil or melted vaseline at night. Dip a new mucilage brush or a small paint brush in the spoon in which you have melted the oil or vaseline over heat or a flame—and brush the brows gently. Be careful to shape them as you brush.

Will you remember—and utilize—these two bits of eyebrow wisdom, girls? Good! Then I shall hear some encouraging news, not only from Mary Elizabeth, but from many of the rest of you, before next month rolls around.

Answers to Correspondents

Betty C.—You use soap too often. Use it on the face only at night, and then do not rub it on the face, but make a lather with the water, and apply with a complexion brush. Another thing, you probably do not get it thoroughly rinsed off after using. Rinse in many waters, hot, warm, and finally cold. In the morning wash merely with tepid water. Wipe off with a little cold cream during the day, or, better still, use a three-inch square bag of cheese-cloth half filled with rolled oats. Dip this quickly in and out of the water and use as a washcloth. It cleanses perfectly and does not irritate the skin. Pat the face dry—do not rub it, after using the beauty bag. The salicylic acid treatment for moles will leave a little red spot to begin with, but not nearly so noticeable as the moles. Why not try the acid on just one mole, and when it has been removed and you have let a couple of weeks elapse, decide whether you want to try it on the others?

Miss P. K.—If you have pimples on your forehead, cut down on sweets for a time, be careful to drink quantities of water, see that the bowels move freely daily, and eat plenty of fresh fruits. Powder is not injurious to the face, if it is of good quality. It is best to rub a little cold cream into the face before applying powder. Yes, powder could form blackheads, if you did not carefully scrub your skin with a complexion brush and hot soapy water every night. So can anything else which gets into the pores and is allowed to stay there. The way to avoid blackheads is to keep the pores clean. If you are only sixteen, I would not worry about my "large bust," because your figure will equalize itself soon. You do not tell me its size, either, so I do not know whether it is out of proportion to the rest of your figure. As to the too large hips and legs, the way to get rid of them is to use them—exercise them. Here is a good exercise:

For Large Hips

Lying flat on the back, lift the right leg at right angles with the body. Then bend the knee, and push out with the leg, as if the foot were on the pedal of a bicycle and you were pushing it down; at the same time draw up the left leg with the knee bent and pushed toward the chest. Push away from you with right, push toward chest with left, push away from you with left, push toward chest with right; keep the leg from the knee down perfectly straight and parallel with the floor. The motion is exactly as if you were pedalling a bicycle in the air.

Mrs. G. B. H.—Where proprietary remedies are sold by the manufacturers, the advertisement always gives the address. Where no address is given, the article is supplied by the manufacturer direct to the druggists, so if no address was given in the advertisement to which you refer, ask your druggist to get the preparation for you. In the meantime, if your freckles are not the deep-seated kind, try this formula:

For the Despised Freckle

Mix a paste by adding lemon juice to a tablespoonful of dry mustard, and finally mix in a teaspoonful of oil of almonds. When you are ready for bed, put a little dab of the paste on each offending freckle. As soon as the skin begins to warm up, wash off the paste and rub with a little cold cream. Do this every night for several days, until the skin begins to peel off. The only way freckles are ever removed is by removing the skin. Be careful not to get the paste in or near the eyes, and do not leave it on the skin too long or it will blister just as a mustard plaster does. Wash off thoroughly before rubbing in the cold cream.

Busy Bee.—The first thing you must do for the health of your hair is to stop using the roll of combings as a rat. I am glad you have discarded the roll rat you were wearing—it, of course, is responsible for most of your hair ills. Perhaps, also, you have been in the habit of roughing the hair to make it stand out. This, of course, injures the hair inevitably. Stop rubbing the hair with vaseline weekly, shampoo it once in three weeks instead of four weeks, and use a simple shampoo by shaving half a bar of white soap (the large bars) into a quart of boiling water and thoroughly dissolving over a flame. Let cool, and after wetting the hair pour some of the liquid on it and rub into a lather. Wash several times, then rinse many, many times until every particle of soap is out beyond peradventure. Do not massage vaseline into your scalp after a shampoo, but, instead, anoint the scalp with olive oil the night before a shampoo. Tie the head up in a towel and go to bed. You can use a medicine dropper to run through the hair until all the scalp has been covered with oil, but the hair itself not oiled. In the morning, take off the towel and give the hair a thorough shampoo. Every night brush the hair gently for one hundred strokes. Also remember that your hair cannot be healthy if your body health is below par. Eat plenty of nourishing food, see to the eliminative functions daily. By following these directions, I believe in a month or six weeks you will notice a great improvement in your hair. When I say "nourishing food," I do not mean, for you, many sweets or fats. You are already over weight—for your heighth, five feet and five and one half inches, you should weigh about one hundred and forty pounds. You should eat lean meats, plenty of fruits, green vegetables, but avoid potatoes, rice, cereals, milk, cream, much butter, much sugar, all sweets.

E. E. N.—You are quite right. The exercise, to keep the bust reduced, must be kept up. When you found it was reducing you, you should not have stopped. There is nothing to "rub on" which produces any really satisfactory results, or ones any more permanent. The trouble is, no doubt, that you are inclined to stoutness, and are eating things which help to make you so. If this is true, read my answer to "Busy Bee"—the last few sentences only. Exercise is your only sure remedy—go back to it and keep it up daily.

A Lover of COMFORT.—I am sorry you had to wait so long for your answer. I have to take letters in their turn. I was glad to hear from you, and had no trouble at all in reading your letter. As to your bust, read my answer to "A Young Mother." My suggestion for you, however, is to take the milk diet for six weeks or two months; from your description you need it for many reasons. You will improve in every way, appearance, health, weight, figure.

A Young Mother.—Building up the general health will do the most to make your breasts firm again. Probably you did not keep them well enough supported at the time the baby was small. Wear a brassiere that holds the bust firm. Exercise, also, unless you are still nursing. If you are, postpone any arm or shoulder exercises until after you wean the baby.

Exercise to Make Bust Firm

Standing with heels together, elevate the chest and then raise the arms until they extend in front of the body on a level with the shoulder, elbows perfectly rigid. Now, with palms facing each other, throw both arms back as far and as vigorously as you can, being careful not to let them drop below the level of the shoulder. Do not bend elbows. Throw forward again until they meet in front; throw back as if trying to make them meet in back. Practise for fifteen or twenty times, twice a day.

Blue Eyes.—If your complexion is really too red, and your hands also are red, possibly some of your clothing is worn too snug—your sleeves, your collars, your corsets or shoes. See that everything is easy in fit. Quite likely, however, if your friends think your complexion good, it really is nothing to worry about. Be careful of the things you eat, as the stomach, if at all out of order, sometimes causes not only a red nose but a red face. Yes, there is something which will make the corners of your mouth turn up, and its name is—Little Miss Blue Eyes herself! The corners of the mouth turn up or down depending entirely on the habitual expression of their owner, and whether she is happy and gay at all times, or sad and "worrying." Keep a smile on your face and in your heart, and the corners of your mouth will take care of themselves. To help the good work along, you may massage with the finger-tips, from the point of the chin up around the corners of the mouth, letting the fingers meet just above the center of the lip. Repeat thirty or more times at a sitting. Never massage down, after the up movement, but take off the fingers altogether and start at the point of the chin again. Dip fingers in cold cream before massaging.

DIPPING A MUCILAGE BRUSH IN MELTED VASELINE TO APPLY TO EYEBROWS.

Miss Emma W.—See answer to "Blue Eyes" and "A COMFORT Reader." If your hands are "always cold" and your nose red, then your circulation is out of order. You need more exercise. Read some of the exercises I have given in these columns from time to time, and see that you get half an hour's exercise daily. See answer to "Black-eyed Girl of S. C." for suggestions as to diet. For the eczema, you should consult a physician for that is not a beauty ill but one which requires medical advice, careful dieting, and other precautions. You should take it in time.

A COMFORT Reader.—See answer to "Blue Eyes." Probably your trouble is your stomach, digestion, or not sufficiently regular action of the eliminative organs. Look after them.

Black-eyed Girl of S. C.—To keep your head perfectly clean, shampoo your hair once in two weeks, unless it is dry, in which case shampoo once in three weeks. See answer to "Busy Bee." As to your dark complexion, drink lots of water—eight to ten glasses a day—eat plenty of apples, oranges and other fresh fruit as you can get it. You know the old saying "An apple a day keeps the doctor away." Also eat green vegetables, and not many fried foods or too many pies and cakes. Take a body bath daily, and rub the skin well with a coarse towel after bathing. All this will help your complexion, and I warrant it will be several shades lighter in a very few weeks.

children of one side were hardly on speaking terms with the children of the opposite side. Sisters, don't let this happen in your church.—Ed.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Since I was a small girl of ten years I have read COMFORT and think it is the best of all my magazines.

I would like the advice of the readers in regard to one of my daughters. But first let me give you an idea of who and what I am. When a girl of nineteen I married a man with four children, the oldest being ten and the youngest two years old. I have a boy and girl of my own now, aged three and seven years, and I can truthfully say we are one of the happiest families to be found anywhere. I adore the children and they think the world of me and I have one of the very best husbands and I would not change places with any other woman.

My youngest stepdaughter is not very truthful and her father has whipped her often and I try to talk to her and encourage her to tell the truth, but really, at times I do not think she knows she is telling a lie. She is a girl of eleven years and I dread to have her grow up untruthful. Can any of the many sisters give me advice as to what course to pursue with her. I shall surely appreciate it very much and thank all who will aid me in any way.

With love to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the sisters, I'll say good by, SISTER EDYTHE.

Sister Edythe. Perhaps you are overconscientious in your stepmotherly duty toward your step child and look at the fib problem too seriously. just because your daughter is guilty of an untruth doesn't necessarily mean that she is utterly lost, for the chances are good that she will stop of her own accord—though you might aid her by removing the cause, provided you can discover what it is. Sometimes children lie through fear but that is usually when there is some misunderstanding between the mother and child. The mother has been unduly severe in her punishment or for some reason has lost the child's confidence. In this case it may be the result of an imagination that is working overtime, stimulated perhaps by the books she reads or the plays she invents. Children rely on their imagination for a large part of their amusement and grownups forget when they did the same thing and reprove a child for mixing make-believe things too liberally with actual reality instead of teaching them that they must confine their make-believe ideas to their play. The habit of truthful speaking and living should be held before a child as one of the most desirable virtues but we must consider the nature of the falsehood before judging too harshly. Anyway, I don't believe whipping will do much good. What has been the experience of other sisters?—Ed.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I wish to say a few words to Mrs. Ida Bell Aldridge in regard to her boy. I am the mother of four dear children, Luzella, age fifteen, Yolande, age thirteen, Lorraine, aged nine and our only boy, Albert, aged twelve years. I will give you my experience in bringing up my children. I am not a believer in whipping as I think this does more harm than good. My boy is quick tempered and when younger was stubborn but to succeed in this, the forming of the child's character, and that I consider the grandest achievement of a mother's life, courage, patience, perseverance and, above all, love are the only weapons needed to fight this battle. I find a boy is harder to bring up than a girl. When his temper gets the better of him I do not say a word but simply look at him sorrowfully which finally shames him. Then when he becomes calmer I ask him what he has gained. I say, gently, "My son, are you happier after such an outburst of temper? Look around at the sad faces caused by your temper and think that you have been the will improve your skin

Many and many a girl has a clear, healthy complexion today because some friend came to her with that sound advice, based on her own experience.

Resinol Soap not only is delightfully cleansing and refreshing, but its daily use reduces the tendency to pimples, relieves clogged and irritated pores, and gives nature the chance she needs to make red, rough skins white and soft.

Hands protected by Resinol Soap rarely chap or roughen in cold weather.

Used for the shampoo, Resinol Soap helps to keep the hair rich, glossy and free from dandruff.

If the skin or scalp is in bad shape, through neglect or improper treatment, a little Resinol Ointment should at first be used with the Resinol Soap, to hasten the return to normal conditions.

Resinol Soap and Resinol Ointment are sold by druggists and dealers in toilet goods everywhere. For a sample of each, free, write to Dept. 4-B Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

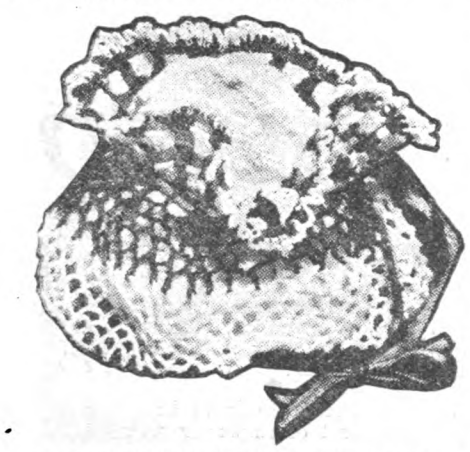
Christmas Gifts

"At Christmas play and make good cheer,
For Christmas comes but once a year."



THIS holiday season is fast approaching and COMFORT readers I know are planning to make it a time of happiness and cheer for those who are nearest and dearest.

Luckily this does not require a fat purse. Just a simple gift or a kindly act prompted by a loving heart and the sincere desire to give happiness is all that is necessary.

Now that the time is short however, those who still have considerable to do begin to look around and wonder what can be made up quickly and inexpensively and still not look shabby or hurried when finished. For all such, who have considerable to accomplish and little leisure, the little useful and attractive novelties on this page have been especially collected.

Bath Outfit

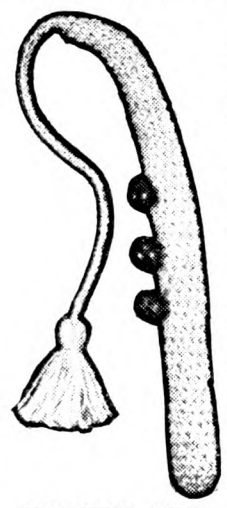
The artistic decoration of towels of all sorts has become a kind of fetish lately, which now includes even the Turkish bath towels. These come with beautiful borders in all colors the ends being finished with an embroidered scallop or an edging of crochet or tatting.

CROCHETED TOILET BAG, RUBBER LINED. FIG. 1.

A bath set may consist of a bath towel, bag and face cloth which may be handmade and also a crocheted bag, lined with white rubber for face cloth and soap, if one desires.

For gifts these sets are most practical and may be made individual by the simple addition of the proper initial worked on each piece in French knots in color.

Knitted Face Cloth



For this use a soft mercerized cotton and steel needles No. 12.

Make any size desired. Three rows plain knitting, three rows purl, and repeat until work is square.

Finish with a long crocheted shell in color to match the towel. Turkish face cloths can be finished with crocheted edge in color and an initial.

Baby's Bath Outfit

This is a gift which will surely please baby's mother. It consists of a square of toweling edged with crochet, for a lap pad. This has the words Baby's Bath across the top in colored French knots and also two buttonholed eyelets in each corner through which one fastens a square of white rubber to the under side, with ribbon. This makes it a very simple matter to separate the two when necessary to wash. An initialed face cloth, towel and bag complete the outfit.

CROCHETED WHIP.

Crocheted Whip

This is a very easily made toy suitable for a baby who is beginning to be able to amuse himself.

A ball of coarse white mercerized cotton or ordinary darning cotton or cord can be used as material. Begin by making a chain of four stitches, join, into this ring make seven single crochet; next round add 5 stitches by making 2 s. c. in every other st., then make 1 s. c. in each stitch until the whip is about seven inches long. Stuff tightly with cotton as the work proceeds, packing it down well with the end of the crochet hook. Make about three inches longer, omitting a stitch here and there so as to gradually graduate it to a point, then chain about four inches and finish off with a full tassel. The bells can be added or not, as one thinks best, but if added should be sewn on very securely so that they cannot be easily pulled off.

Baby's Badge

This little novelty surely fills a long-felt want for it prevents in a delicate way the kisses which are better omitted. All that is necessary to make this attractive little novelty is a bit of white kid from a discarded glove, or a piece of silk or celluloid can be substituted. Cover a wooden button mold with the kid or silk and then word with gold, "Don't Kiss Me," adding a spray of forgetmenots if one is a bit artistic. Finish the edge with a narrow satin ribbon, fulled through the center and four tiny bows as shown. Complete by sewing to the back a small safety pin.

BABY'S BADGE.

Crocheted Toilet Bag

Materials, yellow and white silkateen, No. 12 steel hook, one and one half yards, No. 2 ribbon, 9 inches white rubber.

Start with ch. 7, join in ring, 15 d. c. in ring.

2nd row.—2 d. c. in each d. c., join each row with a sl. st., ch. 4.

3rd and 4th rows.—1 d. c. in each d. c. with ch. 1 between.

Next 2 rows the same but make ch. 2 between doubles.

7th row.—Ch. 3 between doubles.

8th row.—1 d. c. on each d. c., with 2 doubles worked under the ch. between.

9th row.—1 d. c. on each d. c.

10th row.—2 d. c. between each double.

11th row.—1 d. c. on each d. c.

Break thread. With white ch. 5, 1 s. c. in 4th st., repeat, 7 more rows of chains, making 1 s. c. under each ch. in previous row. White yellow, 1 d. c. under white ch., ch. 5, 1 d. c. under next ch., join at end row to first ch., ch. 8, 1 d. c. and repeat all around making 4 rows yellow in all.

For running ribbons, 1 d. tr. under ch., ch. 5, 1 d. tr. under third, ch. or 1 tr. under every ch. Join and break thread, with white, 3 d. c. under ch., ch. 3, 3 d. c., repeat, next row of yellow, making 3 d. c. between each group of double, ch. 3, next row 4 d. c. of white, ch. 3. Last row, 4 d. c. of yellow, ch. 3. Edge with picot of white, 1 s. c. under ch., ch. 5, 1 s. c. between each d. c. with ch. 5 between each.

BABY BATH OUTFIT CONSISTING OF LAP PAD, LAUNDRY BAG, TOWEL AND WASH CLOTH.

The bag is lined with white rubber and may contain a cake of nice soap and an initialed wash cloth. Finish with ribbon drawstrings.

Home-Made Muff Holder

With so many things which can be easily made, it is simply the idea which is needed. Then from leftovers or for just the bare cost of material, plus a little time, many attractive little gifts can be bestowed, for the purchase price of a single article.

This muff holder is another article which comes in the class of quickly-made novelties, as no fine stitches are necessary.

Secure a long piece of wire and bend as shown, making it the right size for the muff for which it is intended. A piece of ribbon three times the length of the wire and about one and one half inches wide will be necessary. Join the selvages, then slip over the wire which should be wound with a strip of scented sheet wadding beforehand. Finish one end with a ribbon bow. Wind the other end which forms the hook, closely with ribbon and also finish with a small bow at the base of the hook.

SHIRRED RIBBON MUFF HOLDER.

A Corset Bag

Such a bag as this also comes in the list of useful presents.

For material one can use any pretty piece of ribbon or silk or a bag made up of white mercerized poplin, decorated with a spray of French knot flowerets, as shown in our illustration, is both practical and pretty.

Line with a color in sateen, make up the bag which should measure, all finished about eight by twenty-four inches. Buttonhole completely around, on all edges with coarse embroidery silk and add drawing ribbons.

CORSET BAG.

Sachets

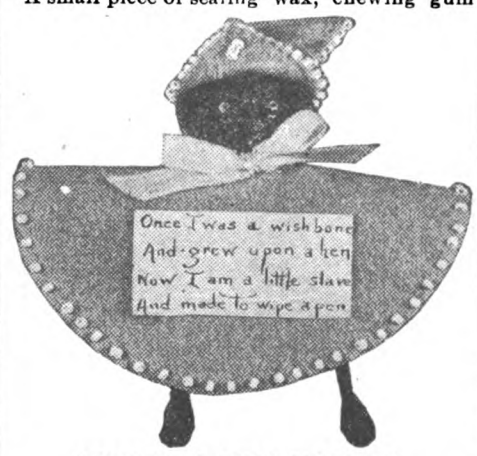
These little bits of sweetness are always popular and desirable gifts. One of the newest ideas for a covering is of woven ribbon. These can be made in this way of any size.

For the foundation cut four squares of sheet wadding, sprinkle with sachet powder and run the edges together. Two colors of inch-wide satin ribbon is very pretty woven together. To do this fasten one end of one piece of ribbon to the corner of a sachet indicated by the bows in our illustration, carry to the opposite or third corner, pass the ribbon under this and up on the other side and back to corner No. 1. Now under this corner, up and across next to the first ribbon, under corner No. 3, and back. Continue to wind back and forth around these two corners until the sachet is covered. Then with the other color wind in opposite direction, but weave under and over as shown.

WOVEN RIBBON SACHET.

It is very simply done as one will find out with a little experimenting. Finish one corner with a bow of the two ribbons. Lavender and baby blue, salmon and green, yellow and white pink and blue or two shades of one color all make very pretty combinations.

Knitting Bag for Grandmother



A nice present for any woman who is fond of knitting or crocheting can be made of three yards of five-inch ribbon. On each end turn up five inches and sew up the sides, thus forming a bag for holding balls of wool. This receptacle simply ties about the waist, keeping the balls from rolling away whether one is sitting still or moving about. Of course the thought represented by any bit of hand work endows the gift with a value not to be estimated in dollars and cents.

And as many charmingly useful little trifles can be made of small bits, no scraps of material should ever be thrown away, for they all come in handy and save many hard-earned pennies at this gift-giving season.

Pen-Wipers

It is safe to say that nobody ever had too many pen-wipers. These are little articles which are ever necessary. If any little girl happens to have a wishbone saved from Thanksgiving it can now be used to help fashion a very cute little wiper. Our illustration will give one a fairly clear idea of how this is done.

A small piece of sealing wax, chewing gum or even putty can be used for the head. Mold this so the nose will be rather prominent indicate a mouth and use beads for the eyes.

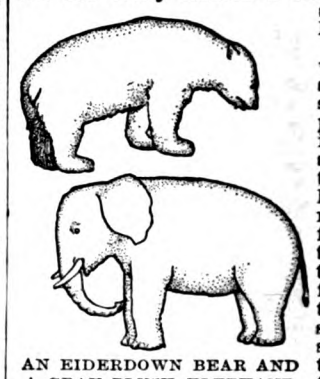
Several circles of white flannel and one of red or colored flannel will then be needed. The edge of the latter and the little cap can be outlined with beads and the card on the front bearing this sentiment gives the finishing touch.



"Once I was a wishbone
And grew upon a hen
Now I am a little slave
And made to wipe a pen."

Wipers in the shape of animals also make unique little gifts.

A snowy polar bear can be cut from a piece of eiderdown flannel or white kid, with eyes, nose and mouth either outlined with silk or drawn in with pen and ink. While a realistic elephant can be made of various sorts of grey material, flannel, velvet, plush, silk or felt would all be suitable. If made of a material however which would be liable to fray the edges should be neatly buttonholed. To the back of each should be added the flannel leaves for real use.

A Stocking Doll

For a child old enough to require playthings, one can easily fashion a cute little doll, as shown in our illustration.

AN EIDERDOWN BEAR AND A GRAY PLUSH ELEPHANT.

A man's sock with white heel and toe is necessary. From it cut pieces as shown in our diagram as follows. The toe forms the head and should measure about four inches through the center. Cut the body from the top of the sock. This should measure six inches with the center of the top of the sock, slashed up three inches and rounded off as shown to form the feet and legs.

The center piece which forms the cap is three inches along the fold of the sock and four and one half inches in width, while the fourth piece shown is three by four inches and cut from the heel of the sock to form the arms.

Make up all parts and stuff with cotton. Use oil paints for the face and shape this somewhat by indicating ears on the sides, this takes up the extra fullness which would otherwise make the head too large. Seam together the curved part of the cap, then sew to top of the head and cover the jointing with a row of feather stitching. This also is added to the body as shown and marks the wrists. A tassel on point of the cap, and a narrow ruffle of ribbon around the neck completes the home made dolly which appears quite fully dressed without the extra work of making clothes.

A STOCKING DOLL.

Edging for Turkish Towels

SEE BATH OUTFIT.

This or any other simple crocheted pattern can be used. A soft mercerized cotton will be best to use for this work and No. 13 steel crochet hook.

One row single crochet into towel, one row treble crochet into every third stitch with chain between each treble.

Third row.—3 singles in first space, chain 3, skip second space, 3 singles in each of the next 3 spaces, ch. 3, skip 1 space, singles over next 3 spaces and repeat.

SHAPE OF PIECES CUT FROM SOCK.

Turn at end of row and make a shell in the first st., or under the first ch. 3 if it comes near the end of the towel. Shells 1 double treble under ch. 3, ch. 3, and form p., ch. 1, 1 d. tr., p., ch. 1, repeat making 5 d. trebles in each shell, ch. 7, 1 s. c. under same ch. with trebles, 1 shell under next chain 3.

A Handy Holder

This little "Polly" slipped into an envelope with a card bearing the old rhyme

"Polly put the kettle on,
Let's all take tea"

would make a most useful and odd little gift for either mother or grandmother. Bits of velvet can be used say orange or yellow for the head, blue or black for the body with green rings. Or the whole can be cut from one piece and outlined with gay colored silks.

Black beads are good for the eyes. Make thick with sheet wadding and then line neatly and if one has it handy a piece of asbestos makes a splendid interlining.

HANDLE OF VELVET BITS.

Unanswered Mail

This is a simple little gift which could be made up with an outlay of only a few cents for silk elastic. All else that is required are two ovals of pasteboard about three by five inches and any pretty bit of silk, satin, cretonne or ribbon which one may happen to have for covering. Do the work neatly turning in all edges and overcasting closely together, sewing the ends of the elastic band in as one works. Paste to the outside of the oval a white card marked Unanswered Letters and an old canceled postage stamp.

PART II.

THE cool night air had little effect on the furnace heat of Drake's thoughts. An unheeded step sounded behind him and a voice sang out: "Hi there, Drake!" but he did not attend.

"What the devil's the hurry?" Page Beardsley fell into step beside Drake. "I'm just walking home after leaving Edith and her friends. I say, slow down, can't you?"

"I'm in a hurry, Beardsley. I am looking for a vacant cab; I am going South tonight."

"Pretty sudden, what?" Then, after a few seconds of thought, "I say, Drake, take me along with you."

"What for?" enquired Drake disinterestedly.

"I am going to work. Edith has contempt for the idle rich. I've decided to get busy. I'd like to begin with you. I'd work like a dog, Drake."

"I've considerably less than an hour to get some messages written and to catch the next train South. Come down later if your resolution holds."

"Here are my diggings now. Give me ten minutes to change out of this silly costume, man. A hall boy will get us a taxi-cab and we shall have plenty of time. You can write your messages while I'm changing."

Like one in a trance, Drake permitted himself to be guided into the younger man's rooms. He sat brooding while Page changed and tossed a few indiscriminate articles into a Gladstone.

"We're ready, old top," he cried after having scrawled a note to his man; "and I hear the motor churning below. Come."

On the ride to the station, Beardsley furtively watched Drake's face. That he had passed through some biting experience, he knew; that it was connected with Julia and her too-daring costume, and Pierce and his too-open flirtation, he guessed. He felt that the gods had shown discretion in sending him across Drake's path. He felt a warm, rushing desire to be a friend to the sad-faced man.

At the station Page penned a brief and impudent note to Edith. "Am on the road to manhood with Drake. There's a reason. Are we engaged now, dear?" it read. He observed the superscription on one of Drake's envelopes as they gave them to a messenger. It was to Julia's father.

Drake, silent and thoughtful, refused to retire when they finally reached their stateroom and Beardsley sat up too, his thoughts upon Edith Bentley and a career—new thoughts, the latter, for Page Beardsley.

When Julia's consciousness returned she moaned piteously from the pain in her shoulder, opening her eyes, she stared about the room. It all came back to her—her husband's madness, his brutality. She shuddered but the anger which followed brought back her strength in a sweeping tide and she rose unsteadily.

It was scarcely midnight. She dragged herself to her room and tore off her costume, kicking it into a corner. She ripped the jewels off her arms and ankles, plucked them from her hair and tossed them all in a glittering heap on her lace-covered bed. Then she looked at her smarting shoulder, the hot tears racing down her white cheeks. Fortunately the burn was not deep; she applied a soothing unguent before dressing in her plainest garments. Then, flinging a few things into a bag, without a backward look she left her house. If Drake had crossed her path then she would have attempted murder with her bare hands.

Two blocks south she found a cab, and entering hastily, she ordered haste.

"Where to, mem?" the driver wished to know, and she replied without hesitation.

The next morning Edith and her father were at breakfast when their messages arrived. Edith read hers with a little stricture at the throat. Page had gone! The suddenness of it made her inexpressibly lonely. Had he consulted her, she would have counselled against going so far away. Surely there was work for willing hands right in New York. In spite of her depression she felt a throb of pride at the thought that he had cared enough to go.

Glancing up at her father, she saw that his face had gone white. "What is it?" she demanded sharply.

"There is trouble between Jefferson and Julia, my dear. He unexpectedly started for Texas last night leaving her here."

Edith recalled now that Page's message had stated that he was with Drake.

"He writes me that he has been a brute—has violated all the canons of decency and that he will do nothing to prevent her from obtaining legal freedom. He has placed a large sum of money in trust for her. But read it yourself, dear."

"I have been afraid of this ever since I was South," Edith said, laying the note aside. "Kingsley Pierce is involved, you will find. They have flirted outrageously. She appeared at the Lawrences' fete last night in a startling costume. I fancy Jeff was wild. I am going to call her up."

She left the room only to reappear directly. "Father," she began gently, "Julia isn't there. The servants found the apartment deserted this morning. I am going there at once."

Her father's shoulders sagged heavily as he rose. Scandal in connection with a daughter of his was unbearable. "I think I will go around to Kingsley's quarters," he said wearily.

Edith found the Drake servants disorganized and curious.

"My sister and her husband have been called South," she told the butler evenly. "A message came from Mr. Drake as I left the house. You will put the apartment in order after which you may go. You will be paid a month's wages in lieu of notice. Please see to everything."

Then she went to Julia's room, marking the confusion and the signs of haste. Vindictively she threw the Egyptian costume into a closet and banged the door. She gathered up the jewels and tossed them into her bag, looking, meanwhile, for a note. She found nothing.

She and her father reached home together. "Pierce isn't in his rooms," Mr. Bentley began at once. "The woman who takes care of them says that he did not sleep there and that he evidently did some hasty packing. He is not at his club. What did you learn, daughter?"

"Nothing definite, dear. However, I am afraid we may as well face the fact that they have gone together."

"Curse her!"

"I suspect that Julia needs something besides our curses father," Edith said softly.

Drake having left town the same night, there was no public comment on the simultaneous disappearance of Julia and Pierce. It was taken for granted that she had gone South with her husband. The Bentleys went about the business of life as usual but their hearts were heavy for the passing days brought no message from Julia.

Summer advanced with a rush in Texas. The oil fields were scenes of continuous activity; the ditches were nearly ready for the water that would reclaim a large area of Drake's arid land; his cattle were in the pink of condition and his wealth was multiplying daily. But to it all he gave scant heed.

Body and brain, he had thrown himself into his work in an effort to ease the blistering memories. Beardsley had become his coadjutor, capable, dependable, steady. Of him Drake had become very fond and into his hands he placed many interests.

They sat in the court one breathless night, smoking countless cigarettes. The younger man was speaking of Edith. It was seldom that he permitted himself that indulgence for he sensed the pain that the other must feel at a tale of romance, but tonight the passion of spring was in his young veins.

"She is a wonderful girl!" Drake stamped out a cigarette with his heel. "You are a lucky man, Page. I don't recall having said so, but I am deuced glad you've won her. I have thought about you both often. In fact, I have a business plan for you when you marry. You mean to keep on working, Beardsley?"

"Keep on! Why, man, there's nothing like work to reconstruct a worthless life. Keep on? Rather! I couldn't stop now. Its exhileration has got into my system. To choke something big out of life! Drake, that is life."

In one of his rare moments of tenderness, Drake reached over and placed a hand on the other's khaki-covered knee and they sat thus far into the night.

Summer advanced reluctantly in Vermont. In a plain room in a shabby house in the factory village across the river from Burlington, Julia Drake stretched her body between coarse sheets, dreading to make the effort to rise.

However, she could spend few minutes idling in bed, for the factory's day shift began at seven and she made it a point never to be late at her work. She was a spooler, commanding the modest sum of nine dollars a week.

Her thoughts took wide circuit. One she spared for the money she had managed to save. Once it would have seemed amusingly little, but having earned it, it assumed proportions of dignity. She was hoarding it, miser-like, till she should have enough to pay for a divorce. She would not ask her father for that kind of aid.

She wished that she might have a bit of fresh fruit with the roll and coffee of which her breakfast consisted.

Finally she thought concretely of her husband, but something was wanting. She searched her mind till she came to the lack. No longer did she feel the stabbing anger which had shaken her formerly. Just when it had vanished, she could not, in her surprise, state. She sat up, languor vanquished.

Swinging her feet out of bed, she lowered her cheap night robe to look at the faint scar that still showed on her white shoulder. The sight of it roused no fury. She sat and stared at herself in her blurred mirror.

She was bewildered. The goal toward which she had striven had receded and she did not care. Life held no purpose now.

She dressed and automatically prepared her breakfast, then putting her room in order, she went to the factory.

Before night she was conscious of an urge that would not suffer control. After eating a frugal supper she went early to bed in an attempt to drown it in sleep. It was of no use, and at last she rose, dressed, and went out to send a telegram—the first word she had sent her father since the night of her disappearance.

The next evening she was at the station when Mr. Bentley and Edith stepped off the train at Burlington. They gazed at her, mute, as she stood before them, shabby, honestly erect, a steady light in her wide, dark eyes.

After a brief scrutiny the sisters, unmindful of the little crowd, flew together and a mist obscured their father's aging eyes.

"I will summon a cab," he offered hastily.

"Oh, no, you won't," Julia looked up to say. "You are my guests, please remember, and I don't ride in cabs. Here is our car. Hurry!"

She piloted them across the river, pointing out the factory where she worked on the way.

"Julia!" Mr. Bentley's eyes were hard as he looked about his daughter's bare room; "did he bring you to this?"

"Jeff isn't to blame——"

"I am speaking of Kingsley Pierce," he interposed sharply.

"Kingsley Pierce?" Julia turned to him in wonderment. "By the way, where is Kingsley Pierce? I haven't seen him since the night that Jeff ordered him out of our house."

The two were silent. "What in the world is the matter?" demanded Julia curiously.

"Pierce left New York the night that you did and we have not seen or heard from him since."

It was a full minute before Julia caught the significance of the statement. Her eyes dilated then. "And you thought——" Her face fell into her hands. "Did Jeff think that, too?"

"You should have let us know where you were," Edith said contritely.

"I meant to go to King when I left the house that night, but when it came to giving the cab-driver his address, I simply couldn't do it. The only other place I could think of in my haste was the Grand Central. The Montreal express was about to start and I boarded it and came to Burlington. I had almost no money after I had paid for my ticket and I had to go to work. I couldn't find a thing to do. I tried the shops, the offices, even the hotels. I would have tried anything. When no one would take an untrained girl, I began to realize my economic worthlessness, the shoddiness of my equipment for life. After a few days I found a job in the factory. I blessed the war that was keeping it open night and day to fill orders. I began at five dollars a week. I am getting nine now and the foreman says that I am the best spooler on the floor."

There was distinct pride in her voice.

"I was trying to save money to divorce Jeff, but just yesterday I found that I no longer wish to. Possibly he despises me. That I must find out for myself. Father, there's a train South at ten; will you start for Texas with me tonight?"

Edith's heart pounded at the thought of going to Page but she said: "You need clothes——"

"My clothes will do very well," Julia returned simply.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

It was a hot evening in June. Drake had come to the house worn out after a busy day. He was haggard and one noticed that the white at his temples was creeping higher.

Even Beardsley was tired. "The water goes into the ditch at noon tomorrow," he remarked lifelessly. "I drove the car to town to see about shipping the cattle. Everything's ready. And by the way, the tractors have come. I've ordered men to start for them at daylight. Right?"

"Right-o." Drake settled deeper in his chair by the empty fireplace.

Beardsley sauntered to a window. It would be another golden sunset, he reflected. The boy was thinking of Edith. Sometimes, when he was very tired, it seemed to him that she had set him a heavy task. He came out of his revery at the purr of a motor.

"Wonder who's who?" he said, going idly to the door.

In the next moment Edith confronted him and back of her lingered her courtly father.

The girl made the first advance. Beardsley was too amazed to speak as she led him into the living-room.

"Evening, Jeff," she saluted. "Excuse me a minute, please, while I inspect the work of your hands. I'll greet you properly presently. Father's in the hall."

Drake seemed scarcely surprised. Nothing roused him of late. Taking Edith's broad hint, he went to find Mr. Bentley.

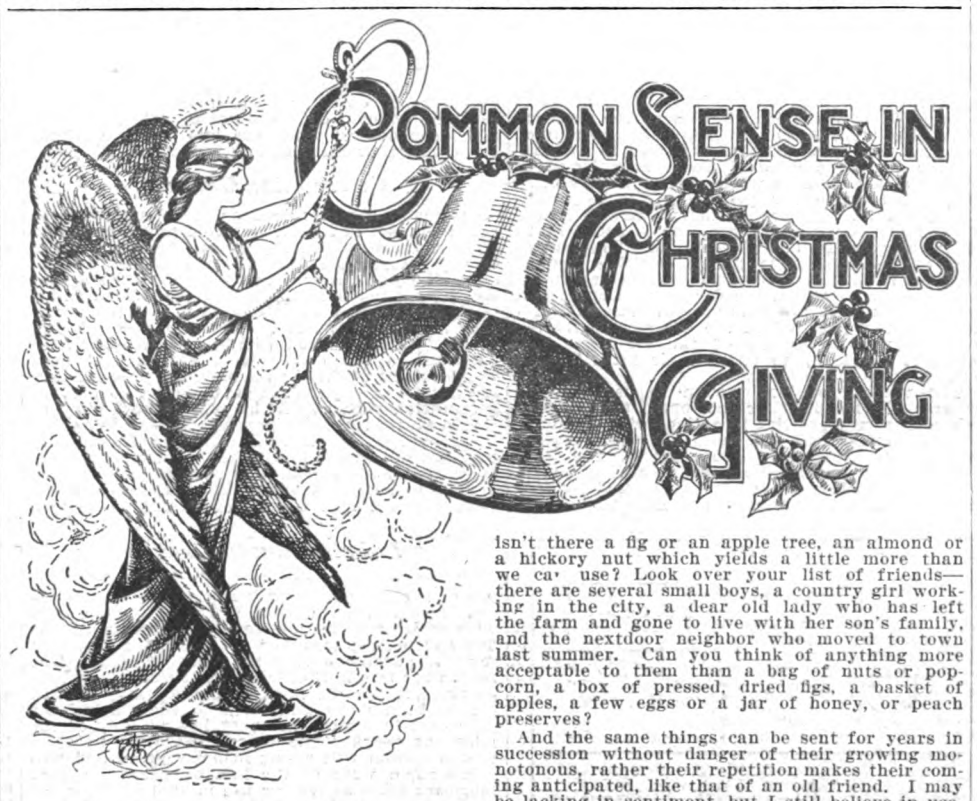
Edith, drawing Page to a window, regarded him gravely. She put a slim finger into the line that had etched its way between nostril and mouth. She touched his lined brow.

"Oh, my dear! What have they done to you?" she cried.

"They've taken away the boy, dear. They are in the business of making men down here."

She put her cheek against his breast and wept happily.

"There is some one in the room yonder who wishes to speak to you," Mr. Bentley said to Drake when their greetings were over.



Drake listlessly entered the library and looked up to see Julia waiting for him.

"You see I'm back, Jeff," she began at once. "If you don't want me I will go away again. I haven't seen Kingsley Pierce since the night of the ball. I have been earning my living in Vermont. I am a spooler in a factory and I earn nine dollars a week."

With a stifled cry he took a step toward her but she lifted a restraining hand.

"Wait, please! When you knew me I was a little fool—discontented, headstrong, vain. Work has purged me of all that. I hated you for a long time after that night. I warmed my fury by the fever of my branded shoulder. But I found after a while that—I wanted you. You marked my soul as well as my flesh. So long as I live I can never belong to any man but you. Now do you want this new woman back? Jeff, will you have me back?"

Somewhere from without came the lilt of a half-breed's song. The drone of happy voices drifted in from the room beyond. The last shaft of the setting sun caressed Julia's hair, her cheeks, her scarlet lips, as she lay in the safe harbor of her husband's arms.

AT this time of year the papers are full of suggestions concerning Christmas gifts and ways by which we may contrive to get through the season without suffering from nervous prostration or going into debt.

But so many of these suggestions are impracticable to the woman on the farm who has such a limited supply of both time and money. We read of the wonderful array of useful and beautful gifts to be evolved from a few yards of lace or ribbon and the scraps of silk and fine linen in the scrap bag. But did a farm woman's scrap bag ever contain anything more valuable than the patches saved to use upon small aprons and overalls?

None of us would wish to abolish Christmas giving, but neither do we enjoy the rush and flurry and strain that usually precedes that holiday and leaves us too weary to enjoy the day itself. If we could learn to plan for that as we do for our other work the mountain would shrink to a molehill and what had been a task would become a pleasure.

If we set ourselves to observe and remember, we could easily learn through the year many of the fads and wishes of our friends, and so be able to send gifts that would please them far better than if chosen at random.

As soon as the holidays are over, make a memorandum of the friends whom you wish to remember with gifts next season, jot down opposite the names, the things you think they would like and check them off, one by one as the gifts are prepared. If you have the thought of Christmas in mind all the year instead of just through the month of December, you will be surprised to find how much can be done with little or no effort.

Many papers and magazines give very nice premiums for a few subscriptions and you have a long list from which to choose. Try to have part of your Christmas money ready by July. Then when the summer clearance sales are held in your nearest town, plan to attend and look over the articles on sale, with the thought of finding appropriate gifts for certain persons. Often one can make real bargains in household articles or dress goods which your friend at a greater distance from town could not secure.

Christmas giving affords an excellent opportunity for practising the Golden Rule. We have all experienced the uncomfortable feeling that follows the receipt of a gift which we know the giver could not afford or which required much time or money that was needed in the home; so why should we in turn subject our friends to the same discomfort? A little talk with our circle of most intimate friends is pretty sure to bring out the fact that they prefer some inexpensive gift which represents us and our loving thought of them rather than something more elaborate, bought in the rush of the last moment and sent from a sense of duty.

Are we not too proud to imitate someone else and strive to send such gifts as they have bestowed upon us, instead of ones that lie within our reach and that they might enjoy far better? In our struggle to buy conventional gifts, are we not apt to overlook the possibilities of our own back yards? Take a look around the place—isn't there a fig or an apple tree, an almond or a hickory nut which yields a little more than we can use? Look over your list of friends—there are several small boys, a country girl working in the city, a dear old lady who has left the farm and gone to live with her son's family, and the nextdoor neighbor who moved to town last summer. Can you think of anything more acceptable to them than a bag of nuts or popcorn, a box of pressed, dried figs, a basket of apples, a few eggs or a jar of honey, or peach preserves?

And the same things can be sent for years in succession without danger of their growing monotonous, rather their repetition makes their coming anticipated, like that of an old friend. I may be lacking in sentiment, but I still believe in useful gifts—things which by daily association are a constant reminder of the giver.

No doubt we have all known the overworked farmer's wife struggling to feed and clothe her brood of little folks, who receives at Christmas a shower of boudoir caps, embroidered hair-receivers and flimsy doilies and cushion covers that would never bear laundrying, and (dare I mention them?) various articles of fancy work whose names an uses she cannot guess and is ashamed to ask the donor. What can she do but send a polite note of thanks, then relegate the articles to some out-of-the-way place, or pass them on to other friends next Christmas?

If one has the time and inclination for fancy work, there are many pretty things to make—things that can be of use even on a farm. Was there ever a housewife who would not appreciate embroidered pillow slips or dresser scarfs, or even a kitchen apron or a dress for the baby?

Perhaps the hardest task is to choose gifts for the distant friend whose tastes and possessions we do not know. A cheery letter is never amiss, and if you wish, you might enclose a dollar bill with the explanation: "My friend, little Bill, and I could not agree upon what to send you for Christmas, so I decided to send him along bodily to find out. Use him for whatever you wish, for he is a willing little fellow to the limit of his small ability, I only wish I could have sent his big brother William."

Another gift that is always welcomed by the distant friend is a good-sized sheet of postage stamps, and your accompanying suggestion that you are already enjoying, in anticipation, the letters you expect to receive, and know you are only one of many who will be made happy in the same way, will surely meet with a prompt response.

Children enjoy the things which will give them something to do. Suppose you were a very little girl not much acquainted with a needle, and some one sent you a silver thimble and some pretty patchwork pieces, carefully cut and basted, and a note saying: "I have been thinking that your dollie may not have covers enough to keep her warm these cold nights, and I know her mamma would like to make her a pretty quilt, so I am sending the tiniest thimble I can find and these pieces, every one of them like some of aunties' dresses, and mamma will show you how to sew them. Don't you think you would get more real enjoyment out of the attempt to make something new than from some costly toy that you were allowed to touch only on state occasions?"

Whatever your gift may be, whether costly or simple, never neglect to send with it, a note or post-card with a few cheery words of greeting for it is that which gives the human touch and makes the gift seem a real gift and not just an exchange of bargain counter purchases. The thought that our friends remember our favorite colors, our choice of books or music or our personal likes and dislikes really seems to enhance the value of their gifts.

And if we begin early to prepare and wrap our gifts ready for sending, the "Christmas rush" will pass us by, and at the last moment, instead of making frantic searches through crowded stores for neglected presents, we will have time to prepare reminders of the season for those to whom Christmas may not come—the stranger within our gates, or the children whom Santa Claus has forgotten.

Dissolving of Albania

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE "kingdom" of Albania is dissolving. The Serbs are marching through it to reach the coast. The Montenigrins are annexing the villages along their borders. The Greeks have sent an expeditionary force to protect some of the southern towns inhabited by their countrymen. Italy holds Avalona, doubtless the most valuable port of the whole country. The rest of the country appears to be in the hands of brigands, or kept in a state of armed neutrality by leagues among neighboring villages.

The world will have few regrets at this passing of "independent" Albania—perhaps not as many as they should have. The Albanians are a reallly admirable people of a somewhat primitive sort; brave, liberty-loving, intelligent. But they have been unfitted to form a separate nation. Albania was made a kingdom to rob Serbia of a port on the Adriatic, bring on dissensions among the Balkan states which has thrashed Turkey, and pave the way for Austrian dominion of the Balkan peninsula. The first two purposes were fulfilled; the last failed, and with it the whole scheme of Vienna went to wreck.

Serbia will have her Adriatic seaport, and probably will absorb the greater part of Albania; a very desirable consummation if the mountaineers receive fair play and equal rights as citizens of the enlarged Serbian state. Greece is fairly sure to take possession of the Greek towns which were included in Albania, merely that the prince selected to rule over that toy monarchy might have a few real taxpayers. The only serious difficulty in sight is that Italy seems determined to hold Avalona, which is as much a Greek town as Athens.

It will be one of the ironies of history if the scheme designed to make Austria mistress of the Argean results in making Italy supreme in the Adriatic.

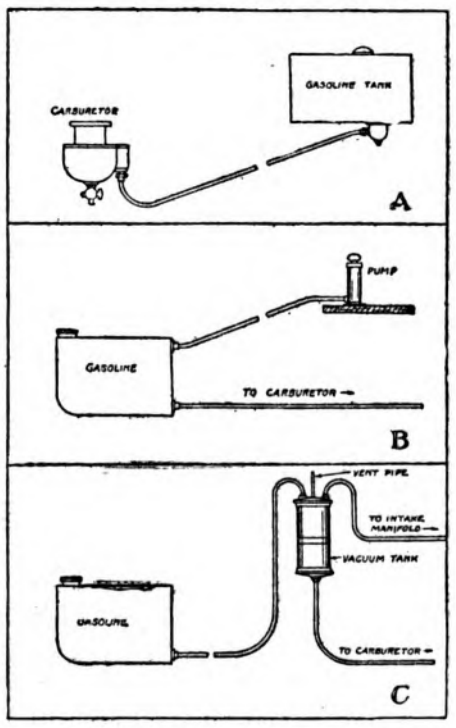
Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasoline engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed.



Three Types of Gasoline Systems

AT the present time there are three types of gasoline systems in general use on automobiles, namely gravity, pressure and vacuum. This discussion concerning the different methods of feeding the gasoline to the carburetor is intended to acquaint the owner with these systems and not to draw comparisons.

The first to be described is gravity, it being the simplest of all. As is well known by all, gravity is based upon the law of nature that liquids will flow to the lowest level. Since this system is so very simple why then is it not used by all manufacturers instead of installing the more complicated systems? The answer is that the car does not always travel on level roads but is required to run up steep grades at certain times. If the tank in which the gasoline is stored on the car is not raised sufficiently the angle on which the machine is placed is apt to result in the carburetor being placed higher than the tank. If this condition existed the gasoline would not flow to the carburetor and thus the car would stop for the want of fuel. Another reason for it not being universally adopted is that as the automobile developed, more storage room was wanted in the car and thus the tank was moved to the rear of chassis. The installation of starting and lighting systems was one of the chief reasons for desiring greater carrying space. A sketch of the gravity system is shown at A. In brief it may be said that its advantage is simplicity.

At B, is shown a type known as the pressure feed. The storage tank is located at the rear of car from which the gasoline is forced to the carburetor by air pressure. Some manufacturers employ a power pump while others use the ordinary hand pump for producing the necessary air pressure. Under ordinary circumstances about two pounds of air pressure is sufficient to force the gasoline out of the tank. The advantage of this system is that a positive flow of gasoline to the carburetor is insured regardless of the angle on which the car may be operating. Its disadvantages are that pressure must be produced in the tank before the car can be started and frequent inspection of the air pipes and joints is necessary to prevent air from leaking out.

The vacuum or last system to be described is one of the most recent upon the market. While it is very positive in action yet it is slightly more complicated and more difficult to understand. This system is pictured at C. The main storage tank is carried at the rear of car from which the fuel is gradually transferred by suction to a small auxiliary tank near the motor.

From this tank the fuel flows to the carburetor by gravity, a method described above.

The small tank, often referred to as the vacuum tank, consists usually of two steel shells, the inner one containing a metal float and valve mechanism attached to the cover. The inner shell is connected to the gasoline tank, and to the intake manifold and is also open to the atmosphere by means of a vent tube. The outer shell which is the larger is connected only to the carburetor and atmosphere. The two shells are connected by a flapper check valve located at the bottom of the inner shell.

The action is entirely automatic. The valve mechanism is so arranged as to use the suction created by the pistons in the motor. The suction produces a vacuum in the inner shell and thus draws the gasoline from the main tank at the rear of car. As the vacuum tank fills the float rises, bringing the valve mechanism into play causing the suction valve to close and opening the atmosphere valve. The gasoline which has been drawn into the inner shell now flows down to the outer shell through the flapper valve and from there to the carburetor as needed. When the inner tank is empty the float again drops causing the suction valve to again open and gasoline to be drawn from the main tank. The advantages of this system are said to be that it practically combines the gravity and pressure system, allows more carrying space in the car since the main tank is located at the rear of chassis and also affords a positive flow of liquid to the carburetor regardless of the angle on which the car may be running.

Volt and Ampere

Anyone who has had anything to do with electrical instruments knows that current is spoken of in volts and amperes. The volt is the term used to indicate the pressure of the current in the same sense that the pressure of water or steam is spoken of in pounds. In the study of electricity the volt has a certain fixed value exactly as the pound means a certain fixed weight.

The flow of water is measured by gallons. In the same manner the flow of electric current is referred to in amperes. In other words it is the rate at which the current flows.

Easily Made Metal Polish

No motorist need be ashamed of the appearance of his car for the need of a good metal polish for one can be easily prepared from ingredients usually to be found around the premises. The preparation consists of one part ammonia, two parts of alcohol and enough whiting to form a paste. This polish is satisfactory for brass, nickel or silver and is used by merely smearing the part with same. The ammonia and alcohol will dissolve all dirt and oxides and allow the same to become absorbed by the whiting. When the preparation is rubbed off with a soft cloth, the metal will appear bright. If a good whiting is not immediately obtainable corn-starch may be used with equally good results.

Emergency Wheel Puller

A great number of the pleasure cars now in use are equipped with what is termed the semi-floating rear axle. With this type the rear wheels are forced on to the axle shafts and keyed. Should for any reason it be necessary to take off one or both of the rear wheels difficulty is apt to be encountered unless a specially designed wheel puller is at hand. Without the use of such a device the operator can often remove the wheel by first removing the hub cap and then the nut at the end of the axle shaft. Next insert a small block of wood in the hub cap. This wood should be of the proper size so as to allow the cap to be screwed partly on the hub of the wheel. The principle involved is not difficult to understand. The wooden block bears against the end of the axle shaft and by screwing the hub cap on further the wheel will be forced off the shaft. Should the wheel prove to be exceptionally stubborn a few sharp blows on the cap with a large block or hammer will greatly assist in the work. It is well for the operator to bear in mind however that the removal of the wheel by this method is not recommended when the hub cap is of light construction or made of brittle metal.

Concerning Gaskets

To insure against leakage it is necessary to bolt the parts such as a manifold to the cylinders after inserting a gasket between the two. Should, at any future time, it be found necessary to separate the parts it will be found that the gasket will have a tendency to stick to the metal and before the same can be separated it is often necessary to tear the gasket. If a new gasket is not at hand this condition will be a source of inconvenience to the owner or workman and even should a new gasket be immediately procurable it is a source of expense. It is far better to prevent a condition such as this by coating both sides of the gasket with flake graphite before installing the gasket on the car. For the benefit of those who are not aware of the fact it will be well to state that flake graphite is not affected by heat or cold and will therefore allow the gasket to be removed as a unit instead of having to be torn off.

Lubricating the Gears

The majority of car manufacturers advise the use of a thick grease or heavy oil for use in the gear boxes. This kind of lubricant may be used with entire satisfaction during the warm months but has been determined to be a poor lubricant for this purpose during the colder months. The reason for this is that when the surrounding temperature is low the thick grease or heavy oil will collect in a mass and stick to the side of the gear case in which case very little if any of the lubricant reaches the gears. Needless to state this condition will result in noisy gears and will cause rapid wear of the moving parts. A gear lubricant more suited for use in cold weather can easily be made by mixing a quantity of flake graphite with a medium cylinder oil. A medium grade oil will always flow unless the conditions are extreme while flake graphite is not affected by climatic changes.

Locating the Cracked Cylinder

Even the amateur motorist is aware of the fact that there are many conditions which will result in the cracking of a cylinder. If the crack is in the outer wall of the cylinder, commonly termed the water jacket, the crack is not considered serious as the same can be readily located and fixed. However if the inner wall is cracked the defect cannot be noticed from the outside and besides affecting the operation of the motor is difficult to find. Considering that the inner wall of the cylinder is cracked a simple method of locating the affected cylinder is as follows:

Fill the cooling system with water until the liquid reaches the mouth of overflow pipe in the radiator. Next turn the motor over by use of the hand crank taking care to notice in which cylinder the compression is taking place. For example should the piston in the No. 1 cylinder be going up on the compression stroke and should it be noticed that the water starts to flow into the overflow pipe of the radiator, this would prove conclusively that the No. 1 cylinder was cracked. The reason for arriving at this conclusion is that the gas from the cylinder would be forced through the crack and in this manner cause the water to rise in the cooling system forcing some of it out through the overflow pipe of the radiator.

Cleaning out Radiator

I have a 1912 touring car which has always afforded satisfactory service until recently. My present difficulty is that the radiator has a tendency to overheat. I believe the radiator is clogged with rust and would like you to inform me of an easy method of cleaning it. J. B., Nashua, N. H.

A.—The following has been found a simple but efficient method of cleaning rust and other sediment from radiator: Place car so that present cooling fluid can be drained off without touching tires. All pet cocks should then be closed and the radiator filled with clean water in which has been mixed about one quart of commercial muriatic acid. This can be obtained at any drug-store. After filling the radiator to the overflow pipe with this preparation place the cap in position and start motor. Allow it to run about five minutes at slow speed. This liquid should then be drained off and the radiator refilled with clean water. Start the motor and allow it to run from five to ten minutes at a fair rate of speed. This water should then be drained off. It is imperative that the radiator be clean of all cleaning solution. As an extra precaution it will be well to flush the radiator through with clean water once or twice during the week following the cleaning.

ENGINE KNOCKS.—My engine knocks when speeded up or going up grade. I retard my spark lever and it still knocks. A friend of mine has a car of another make which has a similar knock. We have had an expert working on them and they run nicely only knock on high power or going up grade. Can you suggest the remedy? J. T. W., Rogersville, Tenn.

A.—We have carefully noted what you say concerning the car owned by you and the one owned by your friend. We regret that you have furnished us with but little data on which to work and therefore it is almost imposible to intelligently advise as to the remedy. For your information we may advise that there are numerous conditions which could bring about the result such as you relate the most common of which are wrong ignition timing, carbon in the cylinders and faulty ignition current breaker. It would first be our suggestion that you have your mechanic carefully check up the ignition timing. It is essential that when the spark lever is fully retarded the spark must not take place in the cylinder until the piston has passed the top center point. After determining that the ignition is correctly timed carefully examine the breaker points. If they are pitted or burnt over they should be smoothed with a very fine file and then set to the proper gap. If the points are loose or much worn they should be replaced with new ones. It may be stated that from the tone of your letter, the writer is of the belief that the majority of your trouble is located in the breaker. If there are heavy deposits of carbon in the cylinders due to the extreme heat in the cylinders this substance will become incandescent and thus preignite the gas charges. If the charges are ignited ahead of time the tendency is to turn the motor in the reverse direction but due to the momentum stored by the flywheel the engine continues to turn in the right direction but is made to labor. The remedy, of course, is to remove the carbon.

Current Events

U. S. WHEAT CROP DECREASES.—According to the government forecasters there will be a total wheat crop of only 654,000,000 bushels. The total last year was 1,012,000,000 bushels. A corn crop of 2,777,000,000 bushels is promised against a total last year of 3,055,000,000 bushels. Oats promise a yield of 1,274,000,000 bushels against a total crop last year of 1,540,000,000 bushels. The indicated yield of winter wheat is 455,000,000 bushels, against a crop of 655,000,000 last year; and of spring wheat 199,000,000 bushels against 357,000,000 bushels in 1915.

WORLD'S WHEAT CROP FALLS.—The International Institute of Agriculture says that with harvesting virtually completed in most European countries, the indications are that the world's wheat supply for 1916 will be almost 25 per cent less than last year. The gathering of crops on a large scale is now limited to North America, Great Britain, Russia and Scandinavia. The barley crop for the world is estimated at 20 per cent less than last year, although five per cent above the average. The total yield of oats it is predicted will be 22 per cent less than in 1915, but 15 per cent above the average.

RECORD IMPORTS OF GEMS.—At the rate at which importations of precious stones at the port of New York are growing, the figures for the current year will exceed $50,000,000. This total has never before been reached in the history of the port.

The Masked Bridal

was absent; and her absence was explained in the appended letter, which he read with dismay and dejection:

"Dear Mr. Bryant:—Inclosed you will find the amount which you so kindly loaned me on Monday, and without which I should have been in sore straits. On reaching home that day, I found my mother dying. She was buried yesterday afternoon, and I'm now entirely alone in the world. I find that circumstances will not permit me to return to your employ, and when you receive this I shall have left New York. Pray do not think that because I do not see you and thank you personally before I go, I am ungrateful for all your recent and unexampled kindness to me. I am not, I assure you; I shall never forget it—it will be one of the sacred memories of my life, that in you, in a time of dire need, I found a true friend and helper.

"Sincerely yours, EDITH ALLANDALE."

The lawyer lost no time in hastening to Edith's late residence. There he learned from Kate O'Brien that Edith had already gone, but she knew not her destination. He stated that he wished to consult the young lady upon a business matter and that if Mrs. O'Brien should learn of her address, it would be considered a great favor if she would bring it to him. This the kind-hearted Irish woman agreed to do, and with a heavy heart the young lawyer returned to his place of business.

Meanwhile, Edith was being wheeled along the rails toward her destination. When the train reached New Haven, feeling faint, for she had not been able to eat much breakfast, she got out to purchase a lunch.

She entered the station and bought some sandwiches, together with a little fruit, and then started to return to the train.

Just in front of her she noticed a fine-looking, richly-clad couple who were evidently bound in the same direction.

The gentleman opened the door for his companion to pass out, but as she did so, the heel of her boot caught upon the threshold, and she would have fallen heavily to the platform if Edith had not sprung forward and caught her by the hand which she threw out to save herself.

As it was, she was evidently badly hurt, for she turned very white and a sharp cry of pain was forced from her lips.

"Are you injured, madam? Can I do anything for you?" Edith inquired, while her husband, springing to her aid, exclaimed, in a tone of mingled concern and impatience:

"What have you done, Anna?"

"Turned my ankle, I think," the woman replied.

Edith stooped to pick up the beautiful Russia leather bag which she had dropped as she stumbled, and followed the couple to the train, where, with the help of a porter, the injured lady was assisted into a parlor car.

The one adjoining it was the common passenger coach in which Edith had ridden from New York.

"Here is madam's bag, sir," she remarked to the gentleman, as, supporting his wife with one arm, he was about to pass into the Pullman.

"Are you going on this train?" he inquired.

"Yes, sir; but I do not belong in the parlor car."

"Never mind; we will fix that all right. Bring the bag along, if you will be so kind," he returned, as he went on with his companion.

So Edith followed them to the little stateroom at one end of the car, where madam sank heavily into a chair, looking as if she were ready to swoon.

"Oh, get off my boot!" she pleaded.

Edith drew forward a hassock for her foot to rest upon, and then, with a face full of sympathy, dropped upon her knees and began to unbutton the boot, which, however, was no easy matter, as the ankle was already much swollen.

The train began to move just at this moment, and the young girl started to her feet, an anxious look sweeping over her face.

"Never mind," said the gentleman, reassuringly. "Unless you have friends aboard the train to be troubled about you, I will take you back to your car presently."

"I have no one—I am traveling alone," Edith responded.

"Then would it be presuming upon your kindness too much to ask you to remain with my wife?" he inquired. "I am perfectly helpless, like most men, when any one is ill and we know no one on the train."

"I will gladly stay, and do whatever I can for her," eagerly returned Edith.

As Edith, from time to time, continued her ministering to the injured foot, rubbing it with alcohol, to reduce the inflammation, she was questioned by her new acquaintances, and informed them of her recent bereavement and of her lonely condition, and stated that she was going to Boston to try to secure employment.

She was applying the alcohol when the lady said:

"That will do for the present, Miss ——. What shall I call you, please?" she remarked, signifying that she did not care to have the foot rubbed any longer at that time.

"Edith Allen—— Oh, what have I done?" the young girl suddenly cried out, in a voice of pain, as the woman winced and gave vent to a moan beneath her touch.

"Nothing—do not be troubled, dear—only you happened to touch a very tender spot," explained the lady, trying to smile reassuringly into the girl's startled face. "So your name is Edith Allen; that sounds very nice," she continued. "I am fond of pretty names as I am of pretty people."

Edith opened her lips to correct her regarding her name; then suddenly checked herself.

It did not matter, she thought, if they did not know her full name. She might never see them again; she had a right to use only the first half of her surname, if she chose, and it would not be nearly so conspicuous as Allandale, which was so familiar in certain circles in New York.

Thus she concluded to let the matter rest as it was.

The acquaintance thus begun was productive of an utterly unexpected result. Before the trip was ended, the lady had induced Edith to accept the position of traveling companion to her, at a salary of twenty-five dollars a month. She stated that about a month previous she had lost the services of the female who had filled the position, and until this time had been unable to find a suitable person for the place.

Edith decided to try the position for a month; "then," she added, "if I meet your requirements, we can arrange for a longer time."

"Very well; I am pleased with that arrangement. And now, Edith—of course I am not going to be so formal as to address you as Miss Allen——"

"Certainly not," interposed Edith.

"I was about to remark," the lady went on, "that I think it is time we were formally introduced to you. My husband is known as Gerald Goddard, Esq., of No. —— Commonwealth avenue, Boston, and I am—Mrs. Goddard."

Edith wondered why she should have paused before speaking thus of herself; why she should have shot that quick, flashing glance into her husband's face as she did so.

She was a very handsome woman of perhaps forty-two or forty-three years. She was slightly above the medium height, with a magnificently proportioned figure. Her hair was coal-black, with a tendency to curl; her eyes were of the same color, very large and brilliant, and rendered peculiarly expressive by the long raven lashes which shaded them. Her complexion was a pale olive, clear and smooth as satin; her features were somewhat irregular, but singularly pleasing when she was animated; her cheeks slightly tinted, her lips a vivid scarlet, her teeth white as alabaster.

Later, when Edith saw her arrayed for an evening reception, she thought her the most brilliantly handsome woman she had ever seen.

As Mrs. Goddard finished speaking, Edith involuntarily glanced up at Mr. Gerald Goddard, when she was startled to find him sharply scrutinizing her, with a look which seemed to be trying to read her through and through.

His glance sent a strange chill running through her veins—a sensation almost of fear and repulsion; and she found herself hoping that she would not be obliged to see very much of the gentleman, even though she was destined to become an inmate of his home.

He was evidently somewhat older than his wife, for his hair was almost white and his face somewhat lined—whether from time, care, or dissipation, Edith could not quite determine.

He would have been called and was regarded by the society in which he moved as a remarkably handsome and distinguished looking man, who entertained "like a prince," and possessed an exhaustless fund of wit and knowledge.

Nevertheless, Edith was repelled by him, and felt that he was not a man to be either trusted or loved, even though she had not been an hour in his presence before she was made to realize that his wife adored him.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE VENOM OF JEALOUSY.

And thus Edith became companion to the wife of the wealthy and aristocratic Gerald Goddard, who was known as one of Boston's millionaires.

Her duties were comparatively light, consisting of reading to Mrs. Goddard, whenever she was in the mood for such entertainment; singing and playing to her when she was musically inclined; and accompanying her upon drives and shopping expedition, when she had no other company.

Edith, however, was not long in the household before she made the discovery that there was a skeleton in the family. At times Mr. Goddard was morose and irritable, and his wife displayed symptoms of intense jealousy. About five weeks after Edith's installation in the home, Mrs. Goddard's brother, Monsieur Correlli, a young sculptor, come there, on a visit to his sister. He was handsome and talented, and had come from France, to "do the United States," during a long vacation.

Mrs. Goddard was proud of her brother, and often attended receptions and parties with him as her escort, and was delighted to show him off to her friends and acquaintances in the most select of Boston society.

On returning to her home, after one of these receptions, she heard merry laughter in the library. Listening attentively, she discovered that it emanated from her husband and Edith, who sometimes, at his request, read to him during the frequent absences of his wife.

The demon of jealousy at once took possession of her. Suddenly entering the library she requested Edith to at once attend her in her boudoir. On arriving there the enraged woman gave way to her passion of jealousy. In blunt words she taunted the girl with attempting to steal the affections of her husband, and closed her bitter comments with the threat that "the woman who tried to win my husband from me would never accomplish her purpose. I would kill her!"

Edith did her best to assure the angry woman that her suspicions were unfounded, and in a little time Mrs. Goddard was half convinced that she had been too hasty in her accusations.

That night the pure girl calmly deliberated upon the subject, and recalled several occasions when Mr. Goddard had seemed to be deeply absorbed in the contemplation of her features, eying her with glances of undisguised admiration and rapture. She determined, therefore, to be a little more circumspect hereafter, and avoid giving him such opportunities.

Another trial awaited her about a week later. Emil Correlli had become quite attentive to her, seeking every chance to be alone with her, showering compliments upon her, and extolling her charms. On one of these occasions he was bold enough to propose marriage, and, before she could recover from her astonishment, had the effrontery to steal a kiss from her unwilling lips.

This bold affront, added to the previous unfounded accusations of Mrs. Goddard made Edith decide to leave the house at once. She announced her decision to her mistress; but that lady, in great humiliation, begged her to overlook her brother's impetuosity, saying that his conduct should be considered only "a tribute to her manifold charms," and that hereafter she would have no cause for complaint of either him or her.

The proud woman's deep contrition, and her earnest appeals, had the effect intended, and Edith decided to remain.

That evening a prolonged interview occurred between Mrs. Goddard and her brother. The result of it was that the sister agreed to do her utmost to place Edith beyond the reach of her husband by combining a scheme which would make her the bride of Emil Correlli.

Some days elapsed, and then an incident worthy of record occurred. Edith had been out for a stroll, and, just as she was retracing her steps along Commonwealth avenue, an elegant carriage came slowly around the corner. The driver was in dark green livery, and seemed to be under the influence of stimulants. Suddenly he learned sideways, and fell off the box, landing on the ground.

Edith impulsively started forward, shouted "Whoa" to the horses, and lifted the reins. The animals stopped immediately, and in a moment a lovely face was thrust from the carriage window, and a sweet voice asked:

"Thomas, what is the matter?—what has happened?"

She stepped from the carriage and was soon informed of the accident, and its probable cause. She was a tall, elegantly formed woman, of perhaps forty-three years, with large, dark brown eyes and rich brown hair. Her skin was fair and flawless, as that of a girl of twenty, with a delicate flush upon her cheeks, and Edith thought her face the most beautiful she had ever seen.

A policeman presently appeared upon the scene, and the lady requested him to secure some competent person who would drive the vehicle to its stable. To secure attention to this request, she gave the policeman a bank note, and named the location of the stable. She then said to the coachman, who was engaged in brushing the dust from his clothing:

"Thomas, you may come to me at nine o'clock tomorrow morning—without the carriage."

As the coachman staggered off, the lady turned to Edith, thanked her for the service she had performed, and gave her a card bearing a name and address—"Mrs. I. G. Stewart, Copley Square Hotel, Boston, Mass."

At the solicitation of the lady, Edith gave her name, and stated that she was the companion to Mrs. Gerald Goddard, of Commonwealth avenue.

This information caused Mrs. Stewart to turn pale, and otherwise manifest a strange agitation. She quickly recovered, however, and stated:

"Ah! I was introduced to Mrs. Goddard's brother, Monsieur Correlli, a few evenings ago, but I have never had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Goddard. Now it is time for me to go, and I shall have to take an electric car to get back to my hotel. Again let me thank you for your timely service. I hope you and I will meet again some time; and, dear, if you should ever need a friend, do not fail to come to me. Good afternoon."

Shortly after the departure of Mrs. Stewart, as Edith was walking homeward, she was overtaken by Emil Correlli, who begged permission to attend her, as they were both bound for the same destination. It would have been rude to refuse, so Edith consented, although she would have preferred to go alone.

They had not advanced far before Edith became aware that they were followed by a woman, who kept parallel with them, on the opposite side of the street. Monsieur Correlli seemed unconscious of this fact, as he was apparently engrosse, in the effort to entertain his companion with animated conversation. When they were within a few yards of Mrs. Goddard's residence, the woman suddenly darted across the avenue and placed herself directly in their path.

In an instant Emil Correlli seemed turned to stone, so motionless and rigid did he become. For a full minute his gaze was riveted upon the stranger, as if in horrible fascination.

"Giulia!" he breathed, at last, in a scarcely audible voice. "Le diable!"

The woman had a veil over her face, but Edith could see that she was very handsome, with a warm, Southern kind of beauty, although it was of a rather coarse type. She was evidently a foreigner, with brilliant black eyes, an olive complexion, scarlet lips and cheeks, and a wealth of purple-black hair, which was coiled in a massive knot at the back of her head.

She was of medium height, with a plump but exquisitely proportioned figure, as was revealed by her closely-fitting garment of navy-blue velvet.

The moment Emil Correlli spoke her name, she burst passionately forth, and began to address him in rapidly uttered sentences of some foreign language, which Edith could not understand.

It was not French, for she could converse in that tongue, and she knew it was not German. She therefore concluded it must be either Italian or Spanish.

As the girl talked, her eyes roved from the man's face to Edith's, with angry, jealous glances, while she gesticulated wildly with her hands, and her voice was fierce and intense with passion.

At last she paused in her tirade, simply because she lacked breath to go on, when Emil Correlli replied to her, in her own tongue, and with equal fluency; but in tones that were both stern and authoritative, while it was evident that he was excessively annoyed by her sudden and unexpected appearance there.

Finally, after another attempt upon the girl's part to carry her point, he stamped his foot imperatively, to emphasize some command, and, with a look which made her cringe like a whipped cur before him; when, shooting a glance of fire and hate at Edith, she turned away, with a crest-fallen air, and went, dejectedly, down the street.

Edith would have been glad, and had tried, to escape from this scene, for after the first moment of surprise upon being so unceremoniously confronted by the beautiful stranger, she had stepped aside, ascended the steps, and rang the bell.

But, for some reason, no one came to the door, and she was obliged to repeat the summons, but feeling very awkward to have to stand there and listen to the altercation that was being carried on so near her, although she could not understand a word that was said.

At last, just as Monsieur Correlli had delivered his authoritative command, the butler made his appearance, and let Edith in.

Before she could enter, the woman was gone, and Emil Correlli sprang up the steps, and was by her side.

He glanced anxiously down upon her face, which wore a grave and pre-occupied look.

He knew that she was wondering who the fiery, but beautiful and richly-dressed stranger was: knew that she could not fail to believe that there must be something suspicious and mysterious in his relations with her, and he was greatly exercised over the unfortunate encounter.

He had set his heart upon winning her—he had vowed that nothing should stand in the way of her becoming his wife, and now this—the worst of all things—had happened, to compromise him in her eyes, and he secretly breathed the fiercest anathemas upon the head of the marplot who had just left him.

Later that evening, Emil Correlli took the first opportunity to explain the unfortunate contretemps to the wondering Edith. He stated that the girl was the daughter of an Italian florist, who had audaciously presumed to dun him for a small bill he owed her father for floral purchases.

This matter, satisfactorily explained, as he thought, he renewed his protestations of love to Edith, solicited her hand in marriage, and was staggered by her emphatic refusal.

Her refusal was reported to Mrs. Goddard by that lady's brother, and she counseled him to be patient.

"I have in mind," she said, "the germ of a most cunning plot, which must succeed in your winning Edith Allen," and then she proceeded to unfold her plan, which, for boldness, craft, and ingenuity, would have been worthy of a French intriguante of the seventeenth century.

"Anna, you are a trump!" Emil Correlli exclaimed, admiringly, when she concluded. "If you can carry that out as you have planned it, it will be a most unique scheme—the best thing of its kind on record!"

"I can carry it out if you will let me do it in my own way; only you must take yourself off. I will not have you here to run the risk of spoiling everything," said Mrs. Goddard, with a determined air.

"Very well, then; I will go this very night. I will take the eleven o'clock express on the B. and A. I have such faith in your genius that I am willing to be guided wholly by you, and trust my fate entirely in your hands"

"I can write you from time to time, as the much, we'd grow soft and degenerate. On the other hand if calamities could make people quit wickedness, we would have been angels long ago. When a man has learned to control himself and live close to God, and he is learning to do it gradually in spite of many terrible backward slumps, learning to become more spiritual and less material, he will have the power to control the elements and make the storm clouds do his bidding. Already he can rise above the storm and float upon its angry breast. Remember there is no limit to what man will be able to do for man is of God. Not that old tribal God that the warring nations of Europe call to when they ask for help to destroy one another, but the universal Father, all good, all wise, who paints the wayside flower and lights the evening star, and who holds the heavenly bodies in their appointed places as they ceaselessly sweep from age to age through endless space. Thank you dear friend, for the things you say of me and my humble efforts to minister to the needs of the lowly of earth. Such encouraging words as yours make life worth living.

PAINT BANK, VA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am twenty years of age; have black hair, dark eyes, fair skin; am about five feet six inches tall; am also blind in one eye. I am a Methodist, and a progressive. I have lived with Mr. and Mrs. John D. Reynolds of this place ever since I was five years old. They have raised me. Mother was a poor widow, and had to put her four older children out. They have been better to me than my parents could ever possibly have been. My foster-father has been magistrate of this place, for over forty years, and is still holding the office.

Uncle Charlie, I received your story-book a few months ago, and was tickled to death with it. It was so entertaining, and after supper every night I read aloud to ma and pa. I read your answers to the cousins' letters to them, also, and they laugh at your funny answers.

Uncle, I have something good to tell you; we had Christmas tree exercises last December, and I recited one of your poems and the whole church roared!

Dear Uncle, you are doing a noble work, and God will bless you in it. You are nearer the hearts of more people than any other person in the world. We COMFORT readers positively could not do without Uncle Charlie. I do not know of a single person who is acquainted with you through COMFORT who hasn't reserved a corner in his heart for you.

Pa is always anxious to see what your opinions are on various topics of the day.

The Texas gentleman that called you a Benedict Arnold should excite pity as well as indignation. If you are a Benedict Arnold, so were the Pilgrim fathers, so was Thomas Jefferson, Washington and Lincoln. You are a true American if there ever was one.

You certainly will have many a gem in your crown. May you live long and prosper, and when we are all called away from this world, may we all meet in a better one, where I expect to shake hands with Uncle Charlie.

Haven't we any Indian cousins? If so, why don't they write?

Yours for Woman's Suffrage, ICEY MAY PAITSEL.

Icey, I want you to convey to your foster parents the gratitude of myself and the COMFORT family for the lovely way they have treated you, a poor little orphan girl, and reared you to be such a fine specimen of womanhood. The penmanship in your letter is a rare treat. It did not strain my aching eyes to read it. So many adopted children are ill used, exploited and abominably maltreated at times, that I just feel like hugging anyone who is good to an orphan. I remember the day when there was nothing for the poor bereaved mother, left without her mate and supporter, but to put her children in institutions to be neglected and half starved. Now we have mothers' pension laws in no less than twenty-seven states. The same devoted band who brought mothers' pensions into existence are trying and will eventually succeed in passing an amendment to this law, providing that mothers who are forced to work and who have only their own earnings to depend on for support, shall receive a pension of forty dollars a month for two months before maternity and three months after the child is born—that would be two hundred dollars in all. This amendment will soon be introduced into the legislatures of the twenty-seven states which are now operating the mothers' pension system. The women of Colorado are going to see to it that it goes through their legislature. Here is an object lesson for you who don't believe in woman suffrage. Look what women's votes could accomplish for such a glorious project as this and other legislation on the same lines. The object of this amendment is to see that a mother is relieved of work and worry during the critical period when the child needs nourishment, nourishment that could not be given if the mother had to work. This plan has been tried in Europe for some years with excellent results. Institutions are being crowded with sickly, defective and feeble-minded children, because mothers are unable to supply proper nourishment to their babies at birth. Owing to these conditions the expense to the state has been enormous. There are 22,500 dependent children in the state of New York alone. These children cost the state millions of dollars. It is far more economical to see that the child has a chance to be well born than to have it starved at birth and later forced into an institution. Icey's mother twenty years ago was forced to part with her children Today she could keep them around her if she happened to be in a Mothers' Pension state, and give them the love and attention no institution can give. It would save the tax payers millions of dollars if mothers were relieved of work and worry just before and after child birth, and the gain to society and the state would be incalculable. It may interest you to know that under the Mothers' Pension system, ten million dollars is being spent yearly for the support of a hundred thousand children, that is at the rate of a hundred dollars per child. It costs nearly double that to keep them in institutions in wretchedness and misery. Icey, you are a lucky girl. Give your foster parents a hug for Uncle Charlie.

HEDGESVILLE, W. VA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a school girl of fourteen; I weigh one hundred and two pounds, am five feet six inches in height, I have auburn hair and fair complexion. I am in the eighth grade at school, but expect to finish this year and go to high school, at Hedgesville, the nearest town, which is about six miles from my home. I live in the mountainous part of West Va. I live on a farm about twelve miles from Martinsberg, the county seat of Berkeley Co. I go to school eight months in a year, beginning with September and ending in April. In summer I work out in the field and help my mother in the house too. My hobbies are going to school, riding horseback and music. I am the eldest of the children at home. I have one brother and sister. I attend Sunday school every Sunday. I am like most of the boys and girls around here, I am good while I am at Sunday school, and bad just as quick as I get home. How many girls my age can cook everything, and keep house all alone? I can bake pies, bread and cake. As I have already told before I am the eldest of the children, and the eldest child always has more and harder work to do than the younger children. Mamma says I do not work very hard, but I think different.

There is a skating rink one mile from my home, and I went there often last winter. I would like to see you skating when the ice is slippery, Uncle, I know you would make a good appearance, just like I make when the ice jumps up and knocks me down.

Your niece, GRACE ODETTE BEALL.

Grace, yours is a bright little letter. I'm particularly interested in your hobbies which you say are: "Going to school riding horseback and music." I have heard of young ladies riding horseback, but never heard of them riding music. I know there is lots of music when some people ride, especially if they are seated on the back of a mule that declines to go. Of course it is possible that you ride the piano, parlor organ, or phonograph. It would be some fun to see you urging that fiery parlor organ of yours around the countryside, and when next you do it, I hope we may all be there to see. I have heard of musical rides, but never of riding music. The next time you indulge in this musical hobby, put us wise, Grace, and we will all be on hand to see the stunt. I like your candor and frankness. You are good when in Sunday school and bad when out of it. I'm sorry that the influence of Sunday school is not strong enough to hold you except for the brief hour or so the session is being held. I'm not surprised for youth is rebellious and headstrong and does not take very cordially to spiritual things. The grown-ups, like the children, do not as a rule carry their religion far beyond the church door. If we had the right kind of religion and the right kind of preachers and teachers, religious influences would spread far beyond the Sunday school and church. When I look over the Sunday school lessons I am not surprised. Old Testament history has to be taught by a master mind to be made interesting to children. Even the biggest bonehead can hardly fail to make Christ's life story interesting. The way to impress children would be not to lock them up in school, but to take them around the countryside and explain to them the wonders of nature and wondrous work of nature's God. The humblest wayside flower provides a better inspiration for a sermon than fifty pages of Old Testament history. Take children to visit the sick, the helpless and the friendless, just as Christ would if He were on earth. Teach the boys to be chivalrous and protect not only their own, but other boys' sisters. Teach the boys and girls the need for sincerity, truth, honesty and upright living. Tell them of the great part they have to play in the uplift of the race and the development of this nation. Teach boys and girls that there is something higher in this life than the mere pursuit of pleasure, the indulgence of self. Teach self control, the glory of self sacrifice, devotion and service. There is more that is inspiring and ennobling to be learned from the life of Lincoln than from almost any character in old Testament history. The people of Israel didn't have all the prophets or all the heroes. Make spiritual things interesting. Teach the joy of being good for good's sake, not from the fear of hell or the hope of heaven. This is a big subject and I can only skim the surface of it here. Our Sunday school and churches are not doing one thousandth part of the good they could and should do. The harvest is plentiful but the laborers are not only few, but they don't know their business and they don't know how to get results. Teach a religion that lasts all the week, then we will have a world worth while. Christ gave us such a religion, but the church is afraid of Christ. Too much Christ would hurt business—and we mustn't hurt business.

NASHOBA, OKLA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have taken COMFORT for fifteen years and always enjoy Uncle Charlie's writings, especially the introduction.

I have Uncle Charlie's poems and think they are fine. I can't keep them at home half the time for the young people like to recite them. We use them at our Literaries, school exhibitions and have even spent hours reading them at other social gatherings. I often wonder how you can be so jolly and suffer like you do. I only had the toothache for about a month and was as cross as a bear.

Tell Maria and Billy the Goat I like them too.

I am married to the dearest of Joes and have three little girls, aged two, three and five. My one aim in life is to educate my children. Am even teaching school now so we can buy stock and make a living without raising cotton all our lives.

Wishing you many more years of usefulness, your friend, MRS. ADDEA HARRIS.

So you can't understand, dear friend, how one can suffer and still be jolly. Well I suppose it is a mystery to a good many people. What can't be cu however must be endured. Toothache for a month would drive anyone crazy, but if you knew that toothache was going to continue for the rest of your life, you'd decide to do one of two things, jump off the dock or use every atom of your will power to shut out the pain. When I first became an invalid I was irritable and rebellious. Then when I found kicking and complaining only made matters worse, I took the thing philosophically and made the best of it. I spent six years in hospitals and institutions. I schooled myself to shut out the most horrible sights and the most terrifying sounds. Many a funny song and pome have I written to the accompaniment of the death rattle. I didn't get callousned or hardened. I just built a little imaginary world of my own and lived in that and never came out of it except when forced to. Many and many a time when life has seemed unbearable, my responsibilities too great to be borne, and somebody was taking care of me while my guardian angels were out taking a little recreation, I've picked up the phone, preliminary to calling up an ambulance to take me to a city hospital. Then I thought what a cowardly thing that would be to do—to run away like a cur dog from the battlefield of life, humiliated and defeated. Fortunately most of us have others dependent on us, aged and infirm relatives, faithful and devoted friends, or helpless little children. I have my share of such. If it was only a matter of self we would give up. The thought of those other lives, the thought of those who have toiled for us, suffered for us, acts as a bugle call to everything that is heroic and worthy in our natures. We cannot lay down our cross without making the crosses of others more than they can bear, and just as that resolve comes into our souls, that kindly Providence that tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, lifts the cross of thorns a little from our tortured brows and eases the pain in our racked bodies and lights again the lamp of hope in the skies of despair. That's how Providence keeps doing with me. Just when I feel I can't endure another straw, and want to close my eyes and give up, some blessed ease will come. Sometimes it's a long, long time in coming but it always comes. We know that those little oases of ease in the great, dark, dreary desert of suffering and pain will eventually be reached, and know that finally will come that eternal oasis where pain will be no more, and that is what heartens us to go on. I hope you will succeed in educating your little ones without too much interference from the boll weevil.

WHEELER, TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am writing to the Cousins' League because I'm interested in your rules. They are fine. Let every one keep them and they will make fine men and women. I'm fifteen years old. I would be glad to hear from any of the cousins. I have just written to two of the girls in the League and Mercy Work. I sent them a handkerchief apiece. I am the sheriff's daughter. Papa is holding office for the third term. We live in the jail. It is a nice place. We have a fine country out here. It is good and healthy. I never have been sick, I don't know what it would be like. I must praise you again. The League is the most wonderful thing. I like to read the COMFORT. I'm in the ninth grade. We have a large car. IRENE GUANTER.

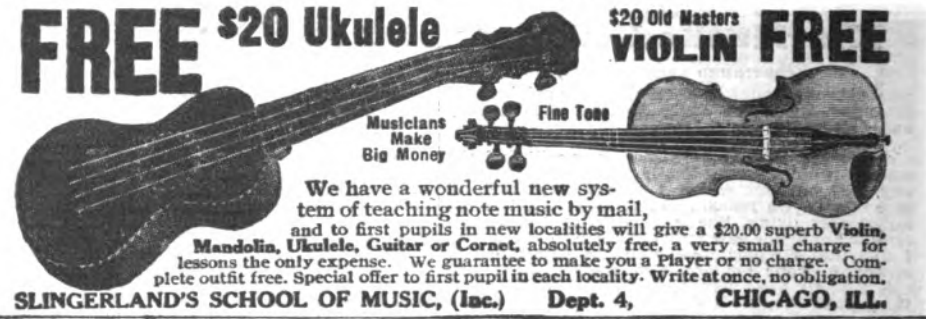
Irene, I am delighted to meet the sheriff's daughter. You know I just can't get over you living in that jail. Strange you should select a jail as a place of residence. What did you and papa do to get sent to jail? The Goat says you didn't get sent, you got elected. We gather from your letter that this is the third time you have been elected to jail. That must be an awful mean bunch of people in your county, Irene, and they must have got it in for you, or you and papa must be awfully naughty or they would not persist in electing you to jail. I'm glad that your jail is a nice place. None of the jails that I was ever in were particularly nice. They had too many bars in them, and as I am a strong prohibitionist I naturally object to bars. Do you think if I were to come down to Wheeler, Texas, I would get elected to jail? About the quickest way to get to jail down South would be to make a speech on woman suffrage. Never mind, if the men put me in jail for talking on that subject the women would soon pull me out. I tell you right now Irene, I'd rather be in jail in progressive Texas than walking about free in some sections of these United States. I've a warm spot in my heart for Texas, though it is nearly thirty years since I honored your state with a visit. I hope some day Irene, you will be able to catch Mr. Villa and put him in one of your cells, and if you could only go over to Europe and catch the Austrian and German Kaisers, the Czar and King Georgie, and put them all in nice, warm cells in your jail, then hire me to come down and do the cooking for them, I would not charge you a cent for my professional services. I'd cook up a nice little lynching bee, and when it was all over there would be peace on the Rio Grande and peace in Europe. I've always had a strong desire to remove the kinks from the world, and now that we've got a sheriff's daughter who owns a private jail, I don't see why I should not get busy and do the job up in good shape. So you have a large car. What's the good of a car to people who live in jail? Irene, here's a conundrum for you: "Why are the prisoners in your jail like an automobile?" Give it up? "Because they have been retired." Here's another one Irene, I got this out of Billy the Goat's joke book. "Why is Texas the most militaristic state in the Union?" "Because even the oil wells are being drilled." Irene, I'm not surprised that you take an interest in shut-ins, considering the number of them you have in your jail.

ADA, OKLA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I thought perhaps you could give me some information that would enable me to earn some money. I'm a telephone operator, but I wish to join the movies. Which company is the best to apply to is what I want to find out. I want the address of reliable, good paying companies. Could you send me some.

I am sincerely, ESTHER HOBSON.



Esther, take my advice and give the movies a wide berth. There are a few people who make immense sums out of the movie business, but the rank and file don't make a bare existence and won't do until the business is organized, just as the actors and the railroad employes have had to organize their business. The amusement business attracts more skins, frauds, sharks and shysters than any other industry or profession. If a girl is very beautiful and very clever and has a whole lot of influence both the stage and the screen offer opportunities for money making not found in any other line of effort. Directly however, a girl gets in the limelight, unless she has a will of iron, a character of steel, the fortitude of a saint, the resisting power of a Gibraltar, she will be the prey of many villains who haunt every avenue of the amusement business. For every girl who can go through this fiery furnace unscathed, a hundred fall by the wayside. Throw scores or hundreds of young people together of either sex, girls without chaperonage or protection, and young men, cold, calculating and conscienceless, wise to every worldly wile of the libertine and the debaucher, and you know what is going to happen to the girl. The artistic temperament (and nearly all who gravitate towards the stage and screen have that temperament in a lesser or greater degree) is a hard thing to control, and it leads people to perpetrate unconventional acts which make the average person stand aghast. Promiscuity, which invites familiarity is the greatest menace to morals. Men who would not dare accost a girl on the street and who would not be allowed to cross the threshold of a hog pen, let alone enter a decent home, can in the movie business, act with the greatest familiarity and find the movie rehearsal environment an ideal field for exploiting their peculiar deviltry. In New York the supernumaries and "extras" who fill out the backgrounds of the spectacular films, have been scandalously exploited by the agents who hire the hordes of people needed in many of the picture plays. The company pays three dollars a day, the agent takes half and for his dollar and a half the poor movie "fan" may have to hang around for hours and hours and at times do a number of stunts that would make a Carnegie medal hero look sick. The screen supers are organizing to protect their interests and get a living wage for their strenuous work. I know a young lady, bright and attractive who had screen fever. She had come into quite a snug little legacy and she determined to break into film work. She spent six or seven hundred dollars on costumes, another hundred dollars on photographs (the latter she left in bunches with all the movie agents in New York). She had no artistic ability, but she made a fine appearance. I got a friend of mine, a movie director to take an interest in her. In four weeks she earned the large sum of ten dollars. Her living expenses, carfare, etc., in the meantime cost her seventy-five dollars. She found that to get on in the movies she had to pay the price, a price no decent, honorable woman will pay. She took my advice and got out of it. The picture business is a fine one for girls to stay out of.

MIDWAY, Wash Co., PA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

You sure write some fine pieces. I agree with you where you speak about feeding the brain with good reading as well as the body with food. I surely like to read and believe me, people can learn a whole lot by reading your pieces. I don't see where you get time to write the pieces you do, and take care of the cousins' letters as well. And you must read a lot also to get all the knowledge you have. I believe in

Tray-Cloth 20x26 Inches

Premium No. 7841
For One Subscription

WE call the above one of the handsomest designs in a tray-cloth we have yet seen to say nothing of its large size, which is 20 x 26 inches and yet in spite of its size it does not require an unusual amount of work to finish it. The stitches themselves are simple as it may be worked either in solid or eyelet embroidery with buttonhole edge. It looks the neatest when worked all in white, although one or more colors may be used if desired. This extra large, attractive tray-cloth comes stamped on pure white "Butcher cloth" which in reality is a very fine linen finished cotton—a material which has the appearance of pure linen and will if anything give longer service. We will make you a present of this tray-cloth upon the terms of one of the following special offers.

Offer 7841A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25c we will send you this handsome tray-cloth free by parcel post prepaid.

Offer 7841B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25c and 10c additional (35c in all) we will send you this tray-cloth free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7841.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

E. C., Carterville, Ill.—It would be quite proper for you to write a letter of sympathy to an old sweetheart whose wife had died. As you are married and your sweetheart days were years ago, such a letter could only be as one from a dear friend.

Blue Eyes, Atlanta, Ga.—If you were deceived and knew nothing of the drinking habits of the man you married there may be a reason why you should leave him if he continues to drink and conduct himself as he does. If you knew before that he was a drunkard, there is no reason now why you should leave him. On the contrary, you should stay with him and try to reform him, as many girls who marry drinkers to reform them think they can do, to their lifelong sorrow. As to going on the stage to make your own living, if you have the ability and a good position is offered you at the beginning, as you state, the risk is not much greater than in other gainful positions taken by women. The atmosphere of the stage, however, is not a healthy one and we would not recommend it except in particular cases. There are many high-minded men and women on the stage, but more who are not and the majority rules in the result.

Sweet Genevieve, Mannington, Va.—First cousins may kiss all they please—their parents, brothers and sisters but first cousins, or any other cousins or different sex should not kiss to excess. A lady may write to her first cousin first, but ordinarily cousins don't wait on etiquette in their correspondence.

Two Friends, Verona, N. Y.—When a lady twenty years old is told of her lover's love and he asks her to marry him and kisses her, etiquette does not prescribe any rule of action on her part, but the inference may be drawn that she would be within the rules of propriety if she kissed him in return for his kisses and other courtesies. (2) When girls and boys of school age go driving they should have a chaperon.

COMFORT Reader, Smithfield, Utah.—It is a matter largely of circumstances and personal acquaintance as to whether a lady shall say "Thank you," when asked to dance. If everybody says it at the dances which you attend, it would be just as well to follow the custom. Don't try to make fashions unless you are a great power socially.

Bride-to-be, Mt. Carmel, Ill.—The announcement of a wedding is made in the name of the parents of the bride usually, but when that is not possible, then in the name of the guardians, to the friend at whose house the ceremony took place, or in the name of the groom's parents, or people. Sometimes among the unconventional the announcement is made in the name of the bride and groom. If you have your cards printed, as they should be, or engraved, you will find various forms at the printer's.

Green Eyes, Anderson, S. C.—An engaged young lady should not receive presents or other attentions from young men except by and with the consent of her fiance. A sensible man engaged to a girl not living in his neighborhood will not be too exacting and will trust to her own sense of the proprieties not to cause gossip by being too popular with the young men. An engaged girl, if she cares very much for the man, will not care so very much for society and when she does go into it she will do so with proper regard for the absent one. At the same time, engaged couples, separated from each other, need not exclude themselves from the world.

Anxious, Eufola, N. C.—A young woman of twenty-three should have tact if she hasn't much else, and tactfulness is one form of politeness. When the young man asked you if he might call and you did not reply, and then asked if he might write to you and you still gave him no answer, how could you expect him to continue the acquaintance? Don't try to win him back. He will not come. One trial was enough. What you should do now is to take a few lessons in tactfulness so you will know what to do with the next young man you meet.

Jennie, Nutley, N. J.—No, Miss it is not "the write thing for a girl of sixteen to walk home from scool with a highly respectable lady's man." Nor any other kind of a man. She should stay at "scool" until she has learned how to spell it. What kind of orthography teachers do they have in Nutley? (2) You would be just as well off if instead of going to the movies with a young man of eighteen, you made up movie parties and all go together. (3) Custom permits the exchanging of rings, but etiquette does not recognize it. Don't do it, until you are engaged.

Real Lover, Allons, Tenn.—A man past thirty always must have rather hard sledding in courting a girl of nineteen, but a man of thirty-five has it rather easy when the girl is twenty-five. You see, ten years difference in ages isn't near as much to a girl of twenty-five as it is to a girl of nineteen. As this one has had you wait two years and still isn't ready, perhaps you might get her if you waited until she is twenty-five. Our advice to you is that you let your love continue, but let your attentions cease. She couldn't get a better husband than you would be, but she doesn't think so yet and will not until she thinks she has lost you and the best chance of all. Don't snub her or show any signs of hurt feelings, but be nice and pleasant as usual, only don't play the lover any more until the signs become favorable. If they never do, then make up your mind that love goeth where it listeth and nobody can drive it. You are in a position where you might drive it some, but you would be a brute if you did. Be a man and take your medicine, if you must.

Flirt, Augusta, Ga.—There are clerks who presume upon their "store acquaintance" with ladies, to speak to them whenever they meet them on the street, or elsewhere, but the wise clerk, who knows his manners, never makes a break of that sort, if we may use a bit of slang. We should not call it impertinence, but it is an ignorance of polite usage which is just as bad. If Augusta clerks are given to the practise why not suggest to their employers, without mentioning names, that they give their clerks some lessons in good manners? Write a communication to the town newspapers. They are the great correctors of abuses of all kinds. (2) To you and to other inquirers for addresses of inquirers in COMFORT let us say that we cannot give them as that is a newspaper rule prevailing everywhere.

American Beauty, Skeel, Mich.—As you love both young men, which means that you don't love either very deeply, but the English one loves you better than the German one does, though you like the German a little better because you are German, just remember that you are now American and secondly that the girl, who marries a man who loves her more than another man does she likes better, is almost sure of making a safer and happier marriage than to marry the man who is a little indifferent. An indifferent sweetheart makes a worse husband. Besides, marrying one who is not German will get you away from the foolish idea that whatever is German is better than whatever is not.

Inquisitive, Haleyville, Ga.—The young ladies of Haleyville are showing their good manners and their good morals by snubbing you right and left. You say you are engaged to a girl away from there and yet you are trying to hide it and trying to deceive the Haleyville girls, and get one or more of them interested in you. Don't you realize that that is dishonorable in every particular? Can't you understand that as far as your honor and loyalty are concerned you are under the same obligations to your fiancee as though she were your wife? If you do not, now is the time you were learning and also profiting by what you learn. Here's hoping the Haleyville girls will snub you worse than ever, and that your fiancee will follow suit.

Peggy, Glasgow, Mont.—It might be proper enough for the gentleman to give the lady a ring of friendship, but if she is friendly to herself she will not wear it. Rings are not good mannered presents.

Brown Eyes, Meridian, Miss.—We suppose your parents object to your going with the young man you love because they can see that he is so jealous he becomes angry when you speak to any other young man and they know that if you marry a man of that type you are sure to live unhappily ever afterwards. They don't want to let their daughter foolishly get into such a trap and they object as they should. This is not etiquette, but it is good hard common sense, and you had better accept it or you'll be sorry enough by and by.

cause of all this unhappiness. Do you not see, dear boy, how badly you make me feel when I am trying so hard to help you to be the little man I have always desired you to be," or words to that effect.

I find this way of managing my children brings the best results. I notice sometimes when I feel that I am impatient and speak crossly, my children resent it. not by word perhaps, but they are not so quick to respond.

Mrs. Wilkinson, is my letter too lengthy? If not, may I tell you my opinion of city life against country life? I was born and lived in the city until a year after I was married, then we moved into a small country town where my husband went into business. We lived there ten years. I will not describe the country conditions as most of you know what they are. After living here ten years we bought a forty-acre farm. It was as pretty a small farm as anyone could desire, and we were two and one half miles from a pretty village, but here again the same hard country conditions—wells dried up in summer and oh, the monotony of country life—it nearly crazed me. We remained there only one year and I could not endure it longer. Schools are so inferior to city schools and I find that city children are more innocent than country children. Country children see and know too much of Nature which is not good for too young minds. I do not mean by this that I believe in keeping children ignorant. No, for my children have been well instructed in regard to the sancity of their bodies and how to safeguard themselves but I do not think it necessary, or wise, to go into the grosser details of nature such as is brought before the eyes of country children every day and which, in my opinion, belittles and vulgarly lowers the sexes, which should be highly respected, as God intended. I have often heard little children in the country talking indecently. Poor little ones, they are not to blame. Such things are happening daily before their innocent eyes and then they hear their elders discussing the health of their farm stock. Little ears are wide open and often hear too much. I do not mean this for all farmers for I know many who realize these things and guard their children.

We finally sold our farm and came to this beautiful city of about 114,000 inhabitants. We have a large modern house, all improvements, such as gas, electricity and steam heat and there are no better schools for miles. The city is proud of its schools and is doing everything possible for the children. Domestic Science for girls is one fine branch of training and manual training is excellent for the boys. Children's health is carefully looked after as school nurses are always in attendance. My little ones have had better health since we came to the city. I find the city much more sanitary than the country. Streets are cleaned every day, all rubbish and refuse collected daily and all back yards must be as clean as front lawns. There are no accumulations and, on the average, I think there is more sickness in the country.

I apologize for the length of this letter and trust that no sister will bear me ill will on account of my opinions.

With best wishes to all, I am, a devoted siste,
"GEORGIE."

Georgie. Even if you hadn't made it a request I think I would have withheld your name and address, else a crowd of ordinarily happy but temporarily indignant sisters would descend upon you and your happy city home and each one would insist upon explaining just why her country h me was not inconvenient or lonely, and then what would you do? I know you've been properly humble in stating your opinions, but, at that, I think some of the country sisters will consider it their duty to explain matters to you. —Ed.

NORTH BEND, OREGON.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

After reading Mrs. Aldridge's letter in September COMFORT I decided to give my opinion. I am sorry for her and for her little boy. If I were you, sister, I'd never whip him to make him say his prayers and if I may say so, I do not like the prayer you have for him. "If I should die before I wake, I pray the Lord my soul to take." Some children will ponder over the idea of dying while they sleep and thus have the fear of death so deeply instilled that it takes years of teaching to get them away from such ideas. And if they should die, as the prayer suggests, surely the Lord would care for their souls for if they are sinful someone else is to blame.

Mrs. K. of West Virginia, you voiced my sentiments exactly regarding large families and I am from a family of nine so know a little bit about it. I had rather give my time and attention to the three boys I already have than to have to care for more children. Large families are all right if the parents are able to care for them.

Now if I may make one more suggestion I will go. Mrs. W. A. Hansley, instead of the sisters defending their respective states as you wished them to do, why not let it go and forget it. Even if Mrs. McKnight was unjust, I won't say she was, I hope the sisters are broadminded enough to know there are just as fine, noble-minded men East as West or in one state as another, so let's not turn our corner into a place for petty quarrels.

The letters on care of children are more interesting to me than all the others for I want to bring my boys up as near right as I can. Their ages are four, six and eight years. They are as good as girls to help me about the house. We are living on a rented ranch near Coos Bay and like it fine, all except the fleas.

With love to the sisters and our editor,
MRS. E. H. SMITH.

Mrs. Smith. Some authorities urge that in this day of teaching children the secrets of beginning of life we should also teach them more of the end of life, but this should be avoided until the questions of the child make it necessary and then strive to impart the knowledge in such a way as to bring a clearer conception of God's love and care. A normal, healthy child knows no fear, not even that of death, but is quick to receive and retain impressions and while it may be wiser not to tell the whole truth at one time, enough information should be given to set the little mind at rest for the time and prevent any secret ponderings. Much depends on the child itself for one of the happy-go-lucky type will accept any reasonable explanation and be satisfied with it while another child of a nervous, extremely imaginative temperament, will require a more careful explanation.—Ed.

CRUM, W. VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

As I have never seen a letter from this part of West Virginia I thought I would ask to join your cheerful corner.

I live in the beautiful and picturesque valley of Tug river. The Alleghany mountains surround this village. Any direction you look nothing can be seen but mountains. The principal occupations are farming and lumbering.

I am a blue-eyed girl of thirteen. I wish more of the sisters would write of labor-saving conveniences in the home, especially in the kitchen. I am not lazy but I like anything that saves labor. A woman has enough to do, without making a number of unnecessary steps.

Our state is now dry and no intoxicating drinks can be shipped in. Many little children are getting bread and clothes that didn't get them before.

I believe in girls helping their mothers with the work. I have seen girls out having a good time and their poor tired mothers working themselves to death. I never stop until I have the dinner dishes washed.

I can't see why anybody condemns telling little children about Santa Claus. The happiest days of my life was when I went to bed expecting old Santa Claus to come down the chimney, and fill my stocking with goodies. A verse of a poem, which I once recited expresses my sentiments:

"Let the children have their Christmas, let them have it while they may,
Life is short and childhood fleeting, and there will surely come a day
When old St. Nicholas will pass by the close shut door,
Missing all the merry faces that greeted him of yore."

I would like to hear from any of the sisters and will answer all letters.

With love to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the COMFORT sisters, MISS VIRGINIA QUEEN.

SPRINGFIELD, 727 E. Dale St., Mo.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have had COMFORT in my home since 1910 and while it is one of the cheapest papers I subscribe for, it is the only one that is read from cover to cover. I enjoy reading the sisters' letters but they are so well written that I have hesitated about writing for I cannot express myself as well.

But when I think of letters I have read where mothers do not approve of telling children there is a Santa Claus, I cannot keep silent. If my child had lived I would have had a little son four years old and he would have believed there was a Santa Claus, and I would have been much displeased if anyone had informed him differently. I was a child once myself with one of the most devoted mothers ever and there was nothing too much trouble for her if it made our Christmas happy. My sister and I both retain the same Christmas spirit. She has three children and every year there are elephants, cows, cats and dogs all made from the best cooky dough, and we have our homemade candies too, which are more wholesome than cheap candy. Christmas is a happy time in our family. Sister does not teach her children that Santa comes down the chimney, nor do they even hang up their stockings. Neither does she believe in sending them to bed in suspense, but generally while they are eating supper one of the older ones opens the door and places the things on the floor, as though Santa had pitched them in. Then the whole family find them together. They sit down and the presents are distributed, then they have the whole evening in which to play with their presents and go to bed too happy for words.

Now I don't see any harm in letting them believe there is a Santa, no more than to read fairy tales and myths to them and how do you expect to enlarge their imagination if you do not. If they have any intelligence at all, as they grow older they will understand the Santa Claus question in the same way they do fairy tales and they will laugh at the dear old times they had when they were young and think no more about being deceived than if it never happened. I am sure I don't feel cross at my mother or think she deceived me and I never mistrusted her because of what she told me about Santa Claus.

The easiest way the primary teachers reach the little ones is through teaching them stories about myths. My little nephews and nieces always come home with a new story and we older ones listen as though we had never heard it before, but there are very few I haven't heard, for our mother used to tell us a story every night or whenever she could find time. And I don't think there is any harm in teaching children there is a Santa Claus.

Wishing Mrs. Wilkinson success, I am,
MRS. SCOTT SHERER.

CAMP SAN SABA, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have just been reading the good letters from the sisters in the August number of our COMFORT and I was especially interested in the one written by Mrs. C. E. West of Coalinga, Cal., for I too am a bride of six months and am interested in beautifying our home. There seems to be a contrast in our surroundings, Mrs. West, for while you are located in almost being alive and sharp on every-day happenings. I bet you would have some fun if you were here helping us search round the farm for night prowlers. Uncle Charlie, you ought to see my sister and I; at night one of us will take the search-light and the other will take the rifle, and when we hear the dogs bark, away we go out to the chicken pen and all around the barn hunting for the thieves. There was a family not far from us had two hundred chickens stolen; and there was two hundred chickens stolen from another farm.

Well, Uncle Charlie, I am still hoping for the day to come when you can come and spend a year or so with us. In this month a great man was born. He is fifty-three years of age. Here's hoping that he lives to be a hundred years anyway. With love,
RHODA KELSO.

Rhoda, I am glad you like to read my pieces as you call them. I try and stuff a lot of information, a little fun and some worth-while progressive ideas into my dope, and many people write me they learn a lot from the matter I gather together for their instruction and entertainment. There are however a number of feather-brained, empty-headed, wildly emotional, badly balanced frivolous people who will read nothing in a magazine but stories, and they want to tear my department up by the roots and throw it out. They forget that life is real, life is earnest, and so all the good matter that is put into COMFORT, all its interesting and instructive departments, are wasted as far as they are concerned. If we put but one kind of food into the body we'd soon grow sick and die. People who put only the very lightest kind of mental diet into their brains soon show signs of mental starvation. Once upon a time household magazines contained little else but fiction. People hadn't reached the stage where they wanted to think and know. People who did think spoke contemptuously of the household magazine. To them it was nothing but a trashy story paper, but in most cases it is so no longer. People of the frivolous turn of mind resent the vast improvement that has been made in household publications. They want to wallow in romance to the exclusion of everything else. The passion for knowledge however is spreading and the fiction fanatic is less in evidence than of yore. I am quite concerned Rhoda, at the dreadful time you are having with your chickens. I read recently that owing to the scarcity of labor in the North several hundred thousand colored gentlemen from the South had migrated to New England, Pennsylvania and other Nothern states. Maybe some of those two hundred chickens heard they were coming and rushed out to meet them. One never can tell. It must be some sight to see you girls getting out of bed at night with search-light and "riffle" marching out to the chicken pen looking for thieves. As dogs generally bark all night, I don't see how you get much sleep. I think if I were you I'd move my bed out, and let the dog sit on the edge of the bed with a "riffle" in each hand, then I think you and the chickens could sleep in security. By the way you'll have to explain to me what a "riffle" is, as it always used to be a rifle when I went to school. The Goat says he wagers that the fellow who stole two hundred chickens from a neighbor of yours had a brunette complexion all right. Talking of thieves, that reminds me of a story I heard the other day. During the revolution in Dublin, an old Irishwoman went nosing around some of the deserted stores looking for loot. She struck a shoe store, managed to force an entrance and appropriated a pair of swell evening slippers. These she took out on the stoop, sat down and tried to put them on, but she could not force her hoofs into them. She then deposited the slippers on the stoop, hustled back into the store and appropriated a huge pair of super dreadnoughts, which fitted her to perfection. When she got back on the stoop, she discovered the beautiful evening slippers had disappeared, and immediately ejaculated in a voice quivering with indignation and disgust: "Glory be to God, who would ever have thought there were such dhirty thaves in the city of Dublin." Rhoda I'm grieved to find they have such dirty thaves in the city of Midway. The Goat says he thinks the reason the chickens have pens in your state is because they live in the State of Pennsylvania. I'll make him do penance for that.

What would he give for the coffee you serve?

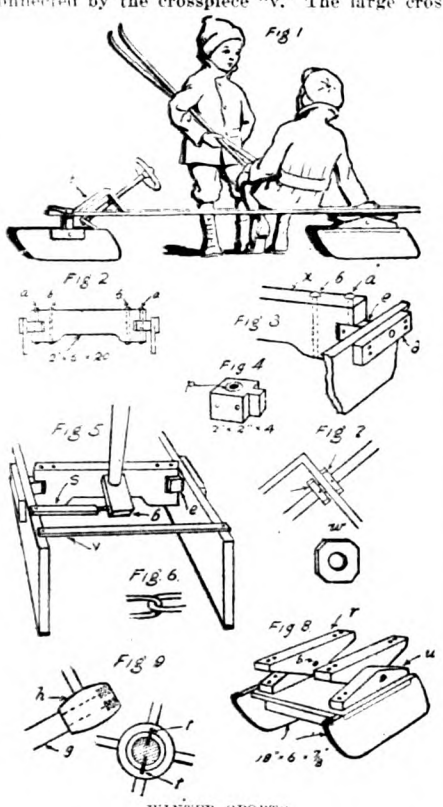
Like a million other women, you can serve coffee that he would give most anything to have—coffee which starts the day "right" for all.

Everyone loves the rich flavor of Arbuckles' Coffee. Of all the coffees in America today, it is by far the most popular!

One woman says: "My husband used to swallow his coffee and hurry off. Now we have Arbuckles' and you'd think it was Sunday the way he lingers over his breakfast."

Until you try Arbuckles' you will never know what a difference good coffee can make in your home.

Today there are whole towns where Arbuckles' is practically the only coffee used. In one State, alone, in a year, four pounds of Arbuckles' Coffee was used for every man, woman and child in the State—four times as many pounds of coffee as the population of the State! Arbuckle Bros., New York.



A Corner for Boys

By Uncle John

"A MERRY CHRISTMAS and a happy New Year to you all," is my most earnest wish. I hope the good St. Nicholas will bring you just the things your hearts have craved and that the spirit of this gladsome season will live in your souls for many a day. I sometimes wonder, if, in all the world, there is one person so cold and self-centered that he does not feel the thrill of the Christmas spirit. It is an indefinable, subtle, vague sort of urging, that makes us want to help others. It fills our hearts with love and generosity and exalts and magnifies the good qualities of others. I often wonder just what causes it, and, because it is such a warm and pleasant feeling, I wonder why we let it depart so quickly. Is it possible that all our lives could be as happy as the holiday week if we so willed it? And if so, why do we not will it? Will we have to wait until some great genius springs up and shows us how? Perhaps this is one reason why the Christ child was born to the human race? The angel said: "Behold, I bring you tidings of great joy," and, having brought the joy, left us to guard it or to waste and abuse it and cast it aside. I believe you will find much pleasure and profit in studying this age-old story of the first Christmas, and I hope you will apply it not merely at Christmas-time but govern your daily life accordingly.

Auto Bob Sled

This picture shows a distinct improvement in the steering gear of a bob sled which may be explained as follows. In Fig. 5, when the steering post is turned, the block "b" swings and pulls the strip "s" which is attached to the runner. Both runners instantly respond because they are connected by the crosspiece "v." The large cross-piece "x," upon which the plank rests, does not swing. It is movably attached to the swing blocks "e." Fig. 6 shows the movable joint connecting the parts "s" and "b." Fig. 2 is an end view or elevation of the front sled. The bolts "a" serve as hinges and make it possible for the runners to turn right and left; the bolts "b" strengthen the crosspiece and prevent splitting. The picture, Fig. 3, makes this more understandable. The bolt "a" passes loosely through the block "e;" "d" is a one by three by eight block screwed on the runner to reinforce it at this point. Fig. 4 is a separate view of the pivot block "e." It is made of hard, non-splitting wood like ash or maple. The hole "p" receives a one half inch bolt loosely enough to permit easy turning without wobbling. It should be kept well greased. Fig. 7 illustrates how the steering post is kept from moving up and down. Nuts like "w," which may be made of hard wood, are screwed to it above and below the slant piece "z." Study "z" in Fig. 1. Fig. 8 shows the construction of the rear sled or follower. Hard wood runners, preferably steel shod, are used and a platform of one-inch boards is built upon them. Upon the platform, the lower rocker blocks "u" are permanently bolted. They are three inches thick and of sound hard wood. Their height in the center is four inches and at the ends one and one half inch. Length about fourteen inches. The upper rocker blocks "r" are the same. A three quarter inch bolt passes loosely through the holes "b." Fig. 9 gives views of the steering wheel. The post "g" is two inches in diameter and, as shown by dotted lines, reduces to one and one half inches near the end to receive the hub "h." Wedges "t" are driven into the top of the post to keep the hub from pulling off. Perhaps you will be able to find a scrap wheel from some farm implement that will do for this purpose. An important point to note is the fact that the part "b" in Fig. 5, one by three by eight inches, tilts upward in front. The steering post meets it at right angle. In the finished drawing you can see this more clearly. Other decorations and elaborations may be added to this double runner to make it look more like an auto. Use clear, sound wood and paint it and keep all bearings and moving parts greased.

Good Books

The boy who is not acquainted with good literature is missing a great deal of pleasure and considerable mental profit. If I could find anything now in all the world that would give me as much enjoyment as the reading of Scott and Dickens and Dumas did when I was a boy, I would consider myself very fortunate. The cheap, trashy novels that seem so easy to acquire are only feeble imitations of the stories of the masters. Read one or two good books and you will never care for the inferior kind again if you have a discriminating mind. Very rarely do we find a person so ignorant that he cannot tell a good story from a weak or overdrawn one. Some persons read for pleasure, some to acquire knowledge some for inspiration and some just to kill time. Whatever your purpose may be, I believe it will better accomplish with the aid of a brilliant mind than with that of a mediocre one. Books are inexpensive and accessible everywhere. The multimillionaire who lives in luxury cannot afford better mental associates than you can. Begin, therefore to get acquainted with the giant minds of the earth at once.

Rabbit Trap

It is a well-known fact that rabbits are an actual menace to farmers in many parts of the country. I have seen moving pictures of community hunts where hundreds of thousands were killed in a single day. If you are at war with the bunny tribe you might try this trap. The main part is a box three feet long and fourteen inches square. The open end is fitted with a door that slides up and down between cleats. On the center of the top of the box a permanently fixed post two inches square and ten inches high is placed. On top of this a strip two inches wide one half inch thick and twenty-four inches long is placed with the pivot or post six inches to the right of the center. On the long part of this seesaw piece the door hangs and the bait stick is suspended from the other end. Fig. 6 shows the slight bevel or slant on that part of the bait stick which engages with the slot in the box top. When the rabbit enters and pushes on the bait, which may be a head of cabbage, the stick is released and flies upward. By virtue of its weight, the door then falls and the opening is closed and the marauder trapped. The seesaw strip is held loosely by one nail, as indicated by Fig. 5. I do not see how you can fail to understand all parts of this plan, but if you do, write and let me know. Don't send me trap plans unless they are new. This is the only slight change in one I have seen for many years.

Unique Farm Product

In France there is a five-hundred acre farm devoted entirely to the production of small trees from which umbrella handles are made. Naturally, the trees used for this purpose must be quite small, so the farm is, in reality, a large nursery. Ash, oak, chestnut and maple are the principal kinds of wood grown. A year after planting, the saplings are cut off close to the ground so they will branch out, and the several shoots are kept free from stems. The following season, incisions are made in the bark and various designs are worked in, for strange to say, when the wood is finally stripped, the markings appear, nicely engraved. The small limbs may be bent and twisted into ornamental shapes, while still growing, but most of them are perfectly straight and are shaped in factories. It is a unique branch of agriculture and the proprietor of the farm has amassed considerable wealth through the marketing of his queer product.

Riddles

What does man love more than life,
Hate more than death or mortal strife;
That which contented men desire,
The needy have and the rich require;
The miser spends, the spendthrift saves,
And all men carry to their graves?
—Nothing.

Why is "I" the luckiest vowel?
Because it is the center of "bliss," while "e" is in Hades and all the others in purgatory.

Those who have not got me do not wish to have me; those who have me do not wish to lose me; those who gain me have me no longer.
A lawsuit.

Puzzle

The pictures in each square represent the name of a Christmas gift that any boy would be glad to receive. There are twelve in all. Can you guess them.

There, dear boys, is all for this month. The next number of COMFORT will usher in a new year and I hope it will be a happy one for all of us. The year that is nearing completion has been a fruitful one. Many of you have written me bright, chatty letters and made valuable suggestions and for this I am truly grateful. I have tried to interpret your wishes and desires, my main effort being to please the greatest number, and, I confess, that I have felt, all along, my inability to do this without your cooperation. Send me anything that you believe is new enough not to be generally known about by the boys of the country and I will be pleased to tell them about it through the Boys' Corner. Again, let me repeat my wish to you, for a happy and prosperous New Year.

"UNCLE JOHN."

Clubby's Regeneration

Clubby suggested the big boy took up with spirit. They ate candy and oranges and apples and cakes, but before they began to eat dainties, Clubby had some very hot soup that a very real old dream lady brought in.

And they wore the funny cotillion caps, and chased each other with ticklers and blew loud blasts on tin whistles. Northcross put all sorts of loud, bangy pieces on the phonograph that made a lot of noise and they marched and jumped and had such a good time.

Once while they were tumbling about, the beautiful thing which Clubby had picked up in the car fell out of his pocket.

Northcross saw it. "Where did you get it, Clubby?" he asked.

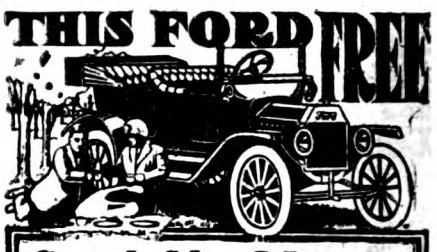
"I found it in the automobile; please give it back to me, 'cause when I wake up, I'm going to give it to the guy what owns the machine, 'cause I guess it's his, and then maybe he won't be mad at me fer fallin' asleep in his ga-raz," Clubby said.

"I'll see that he gets it, Clubby," Northcross replied. "Will you trust me?"

"Sure. But ain't you a dream-man and won't you go away when I wake up? Gee, this's a awful funny dream. I feel like I want to sleep an' when I sleep I guess I'll wake up an' everything will be gone, won't it? I'm afraid to wake up, Mr. Dream-man 'cause I know I'll be hungry an' cold, an' maybe th' policeman 'll put me in 'cause I stole a sandwich. I didn't steal it, Mr. Dream-man my hand jus' took it; I didn't want to take it, but I did. D'you know how that is, Mr. Dream-man?"

"Bless your heart, I know how it is. Yea, the spirit was willing, but the flesh was weak," he said. "Listen, Clubby, if you will always tell the truth, as you've told it tonight, I think I can make this dream last forever."

"Oh, I will, I will," he cried, with a happy voice.



"Then come with me," and Northcross took Clubby by the hand, and led him up-stairs to a white-tiled bathroom, where in a small white foot-bath, just big enough for a little boy, Clubby bathed under the supervision of the "dream-man." The "dream-man" even took a hand at the operation, and scrubbed the lad until he was quite clean, and he presented a very attractive little face then, thin and wan, no doubt, but well featured, nevertheless.

That completed, Northcross dressed the lad in the coat of one of his own suits of pajamas, and carrying him up to his room, he made a bed for him in his Morris chair, and Clubby told whatever he knew of himself, and fell asleep in the telling.

When Northcross saw this, he went to his desk, and wrote a long letter to Robina, and told her of the vague plan he had in mind for Clubby's regeneration. He didn't care what people would think, that he, a brilliant clubman should interest himself in a little waif.

The plan he revolved in his mind that Christmas Eve bore fruit. The result was that Clubby grew into a man of fine character, a credit to Northcross who never regretted that he followed the song of the Minstrel who sang:

"From the prayer of want and plaint of woe,
Oh, never, never turn away thine ear!
Forlorn in this bleak wilderness below,
Ah, what were man should heaven refuse to hear!"

Comfort's Bedtime Stories For Little Folks!

A Library of Cute Little Books

12 WONDERFUL TALES IN STORY AND VERSE 12

Premium No. 7951

Entire Library Sent For One Subscription!

The stories of our childhood—how well we remember them. After all it seems but a short time since we listened with rapt attention to the adventures of Robinson Crusoe cast away on his lonely island—of beautiful Cinderella, the fairy and the prince—the tragic fate of poor little Red Riding Hood—these were only a few of the marvelous tales that thrilled our childish imagination and helped us spend many blissful hours.

The children of today are the same as they were fifty years ago. And these good old-time stories are just as popular with the young folks now as they were then. So we have decided to give our little boy and girl friends this fine big collection of stories which includes some of the old-time favorites as well as a number of newer and later books equally as interesting. There are twelve of them in all as follows:

Robinson Crusoe, Little Red Riding Hood, Cinderella, Mother Goose, Animal Pets, Purring Pussies, Playmates, Our Pets, The Three Bears, The Sleeping Beauty, Playful Pets, The Teddy Bears.

As these stories are intended for the younger children some of them have been "boiled down" to the fewest and simplest words so that they are not as complete as the original editions, but all of them are printed on fine paper in large clear type that is easy to see and read and have no less than five beautiful full page illustrations in colors.

The first four titles named above of course need no introduction. The other eight titles are just the sort of stories that delight every child—stories of animal pets, horses, donkeys, dogs, bunnies, pussy cats, chickens, lambs, etc., wonderful romances in which there are old Stone Castles, Kings, Queens, Princes, Princesses, Good Fairies, and Wicked Fairies, stories of the Bear Family—Pa Bear, old Ma Bear and little "Teddy" Bear, stories of little Playmates, the true tale of the Teddy Bears—in fact the finest collection of juvenile short stories ever published. Each book is nicely bound with a handsomely illustrated cover in colors and is 4 inches by 5¼ inches in size.

There is nothing you could get for the children that would make them any happier than this fine story collection and best of all it will cost you Nothing as we are giving it away as a premium. We will send you free the entire collection of twelve stories, each story in a book by itself—twelve different books in all—if you will accept either one of the following special offers:

Offer No. 7951 A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you this entire library of twelve books by parcel post prepaid.

Offer No. 7951 B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all) we will send you all twelve books by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7951.

When the Express Failed to Stop

By J. R. Henderson

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

MORE than once, Raleigh had been called down by Bill Mitchell, yard-master for the C. & P., but last night they had almost come to blows, and Mitchell had intimated that Raleigh's services would not be needed much longer, "if he didn't cut out the booze."

Now, as he stood with his mother, in the doorway of their little home, there was something about them that was almost piteous.

The young man rested his hands on the shoulders of his mother, as they watched the form of the call-boy disappearing down the street. At last the mother turned and looked up into his face.

"You'll go straight to the yards, my boy, won't you?"

"Yes, and I'll have to be on my way at once," he replied.

"Pleasant dreams to you, Jean!" and he turned to look into the face of a girl standing back of them, and for the time his thoughts were all of manliness and determination.

It used to be that the thoughts of Raleigh Willey, of "engine 1874," were all like that; he had been known as the surest, bravest and steadiest engineer on that division; the man who could pull "Old Thunder" through on time, when others failed.

But the little girl who was his promised wife was talking:

"I know you'll not take a drink, Raleigh, if you promise——" and she came forward for the good-by kiss.

"Yes—if I promise——" and he was gone.

Raleigh really meant, and tried hard, to keep his word.

He knew that down in the yards, his fireman, Nick Wagner, was walking around the big, panting "iron horse," oiling here, using a piece of waste there, and waiting for the arrival of the master of this flying steed, of steel and steam. He knew that his duty lay there, but—he hesitated.

Before him, situated on a side street, was the cause of his trouble—a saloon. From within he heard the clink of glasses, snatches of song and the loud laughter of the customers. Thoughts of his mother, the little girl and home, Nick and "Old Thunder"—all faded from his mind.

"One drink won't hurt me," he mumbled—and entered the "joint."

About an hour later, Bill Mitchell, the yard-master, walked up to Nick, who was seated near the engine.

"Where's Raleigh?" he asked.

"Haven't seen him," Nick answered shortly.

Mitchell was silent a moment—took a few steps up and down the track—looked at his watch and scowled.

"This thing's happening pretty often, isn't it?"

"What thing?" asked the fireman, innocently.

"What? What?"—the yardmaster's voice was extremely sharp—"you know what—this boozing business. If he don't——"

With a start, he turned just in time to see a swaying reeling figure trying to climb onto the steps of the cab.

A step forward, and he jerked Raleigh Willey around, facing him. Then the words came, in a cold, cutting voice:

"You go home!"

The sharp words seemed to steady the whirling brain of the half drunken engineer.

"Go home?" he enquired rather blankly.

"Yes! go home and stay there, until you are sent for, you—you——" he was so angry that further words failed him.

Without another word, Raleigh, half staggering—half walking, moved off down the yards. In a dim, half understanding way, he realized what had happened. He knew that alcohol had gripped him again—stronger than ever this time. What the result would be, he did not know, but he expected nothing but the worst.

Somehow, he got home and in bed, at last; and while an old mother and a young girl silently wept until the "small hours" of the morning, he slept the unresting sleep of intoxication.

Next morning the worst happened—the letter came.

It was short and curt—no word of sympathy or hope of another chance. While his mother and sweetheart looked on, Raleigh opened the missive, with hands that shook, in spite of his efforts to the contrary. A slip of paper fell to the floor—he knew what it was—he didn't even trouble to pick it up. The letter contained but few words:

Cheyenne, Wyo., 3-15-19—.

Mr. Raleigh Willey,
Green River, Wyo.

Dear Sir:—
Enclosed find check for amount due you from C. & P. R. R. Co. On, and after this date, your services are no longer required.
J. C. Brannan, Supt.

That was all—nothing said about the times Raleigh Willey had fought through the heat and sand-storms of the desert—through all manner of difficulties—overcome numberless obstacles, and brought old "Thunder" in, on time.

"It's me for some—where else," Raleigh said weakly.

"There's no use of me staying here—let one company fire you, and there's no chance to get another job—they're all down on you."

Three days later, Raleigh crawled from a box car, at Tie Siding, the nearest station to the "Sherman Hill Cut-Off," where the C. & P. were shortening their line from Cheyenne.

With a few dollars still left in his pocket, Raleigh started for a "soup-joint" a short distance from the track. Although there were several saloons in the place, and they seemed to be beckoning him, with their gilded signs and swinging doors, he passed resolutely on, into the restaurant, where he was soon enjoying a lunch of hot soup and baked beans. The owner, an inquisitive sort of individual, began to question him as he ate.

"Stranger here?" he enquired curiously.

"Yes."

"Going to work at the cut-off?"

"Don't know. Plenty of work there?"

The restaurant man hesitated, then——

"Well, I guess it's rather scarce now. You see, they've about finished the tunnel; the fill is all made, and a track laid from the main line to the east portal. Anyhow, it's a tough place now—they say there's a bunch of the 'Robber's Roost' gang hanging out somewhere around there—probably waiting for pay-day, to make a raid on this place. The men cash all their checks here, you know, and besides——" here he broke off to ask:

"Have you seen today's paper?"

"No," replied Raleigh, indifferently.

"Read that——" and he shoved a greasy paper across the counter, to Raleigh, and pointed to a paragraph, which stated that the Atlantic Express was carrying $50,000 worth of gold bullion, from the newly discovered Lucky Hit Mines, at Oronogo, to Denver. The paper also stated that the president's private car was attached to the same train.

Finishing his lunch, Raleigh paid his bill and strolled outside. He had decided against his intention of seeking employment at the "cut-off," and determined to go on to Cheyenne, see the president, implore him to give him another chance, and then, if unsuccessful, go to the mines in Colorado.

Whatever happened to him, he had sworn never to take another intoxicating drink. And he meant to keep his oath—to show his mother and sweetheart—his former employers and friends, that he could, and would, be a man among men, once more.

"I'll show them! I'll show them!" he repeated. The words seemed to have a soothing effect on his dry and scorched lips.

"If I can only get to Cheyenne and talk to the president——"

He was interrupted by the sound of a hoarse whistle in the distance.

"Here's my chance," he muttered, as the Atlantic Express pulled into the station, for coal and water. Raleigh, watching his chance, sneaked forward and climbed onto the blind-baggage.

He flattened himself out in the blind doorway, and waited.

Having coaled, the engine pulled forward to the water tank.

The fireman clambered back on the coal—but did not see the dim figure on the blind. A minute—two—then, a clang of the bell, a screech of the whistle, a puff of the exhaust and a million sparks ascending from the short, "sawed-off" stack—and the Express continued on its flying journey.

A mile—two—five. The strain of standing was becoming tiresome. With the idea of climbing onto the tender, where he could rest, Raleigh started,—then stopped, as the figure of a man brushed by him, from the steps where he had been crouching.

Almost touching Raleigh, but not seeing him, the man climbed on to the tender, ahead of him. This new actor on the scene had a bandanna handkerchief wrapped around the lower part of his face, and held a wicked looking "automatic" in his right hand. He was there for no good. He was crawling slowly forward toward the cab, where the unsuspecting engineer and fireman sat with their backs turned toward this creeping menace.

A flash of fire seemed to shoot through Raleigh's brain, as the remembrance of the article he had read in the paper, came to his mind. Also, he remembered what the restaurant keeper had told him about the "Robber's Roost" gang holding out in the neighborhood of the "cut-off." He realized fully what it meant—train robbers! For a minute he crouched—hesitated—then arose, with a grim look on his face.

"The same old game, eh?" The sound of his voice was drowned in the roar of the swiftly flying Express.

"The same old thing—capture the engineer and fireman—make them stop the train at a certain point, where the rest of the gang is waiting—uncouple the express car—move ahead and loot it at their leisure. But I'll put a stop to that, or know the reason why."

The bandit crawled on and on, his pistol raised for instant use, the muscles of his legs tightening for the spring that would mean the capture of the engine. Slowly, cat like, with a drawn, hardened look upon his features, Raleigh Willey followed him.

"Put up your hands!" It was the bandit's command that sounded above the hiss of steam and roar of the rushing engine.

"Hands up—and quick—do what I——" There sounded a sharp report—a scream, and the stricken engineer closed the throttle as he fell backwards, on to the floor of the cab.

The bandit turned, with smoking pistol, to meet Raleigh, whose great fists were pounding his flesh, like the piston rods of an engine. Once—twice—the automatic spoke again, but the bullets went wild, and with a final fierce blow, Raleigh sent the would-be robber to the floor near the fallen engineer.

A quick look at the crushed and broken arm of the latter, and he leaped forward into the seat.

"Hold that man—tie him up, and watch him," he shouted hoarsely, to the fireman, as he pointed to the insensible bandit.

"I'm going to take this train through!" and as he gave the throttle a sharp pull, the huge monster of steel once more leaped forward to her pace.

Back in the president's private car, this great man was interrupted in his reading of an important stock report, by the slowing down, then sudden increased speed of the train.

"Wonder what's the matter," he muttered, then resumed his reading. But Raleigh Willey neither knew, nor cared what the president of the C. & P. was doing or thinking of. He knew, that far down the track—probably at the end of the cut-off—a band of reckless, dangerous men were waiting for their confederate to stop the Express, that they might "crack" the safe and make away with the $50,000, in gold bullion. He knew that through this cut, he must force the heavy train with the speed of an avalanche—he must run the gauntlet—in order to escape.

The wounded engineer had sat up, and was watching the cursing, screaming wretch on the floor, while the fireman fed the seething, roaring caldron, within the fire-box, with shovel upon shovel of smutty "black diamonds." Up—up—went the needle of the steam gauge; faster and faster and faster went the flying monster.

Ahead, Raleigh saw the figures of six or seven men waiting.

With a sarcastic grin upon his greasy, dust-begrimed face, he jerked the throttle wide open, leaned out the window and—laughed. The fireman grabbed the whistle cord, and with a fearful screech, a flash and a roar, the train went tearing, thundering by the point of danger. They had attained a fearful speed; there were many shots fired by the bandit's, but no one was injured.

"There was no danger of them hitting us," he shouted to his fireman, with a grin.

"Why?" motioned his mate.

"Because, we were going so fast that the bullets intended for us, would come nearer the president in the rear car."

At the next station, the captured bandit was turned over to the police. Raleigh helped them get him out of the cab, and began looking after his engine—oiling here and there—after its recent burst of awful speed.

In the meantime, his fireman had been explaining matters (with embellishments) to the president, who had come forward. Holding out his hand to Raleigh, the president exclaimed:

"Good work! fine work! old man." Then with a start:

"Aren't you the man who pulled my car through that awful storm—over a sinking bridge and——"

"I guess you know the whole story," interrupted Raleigh, "how I lost out—how I lost 'Old Thunder——"

The president's face was serious.

"Yes, I know, but let us forget about that—here's a little present——" He was again interrupted:

"I lost 'Old Thunder' because I deserved it. But that's all passed, Mr. Daniels. I've started on a new record—and it's a clean one—that I'll swear to. I don't want money, Mr. Daniels—I want 'Old Thunder,' and if you'll give me another chance, I'll make good."

One week later, there was a wedding in Green River.

Everybody was happy, but a certain old mother was delirious with joy, and was trying her best to tell everyone the wonderful story of her boy's success. A knock sounded on the door—a letter was handed in. Raleigh paled—perhaps they had no faith in him after all—perhaps they had decided not to——

"Read it," he said brokenly, to his wife. She trembled too, as she read:

Cheyenne, Wyo., 3-29-19—.

Mr. Raleigh Willey, Green River, Wyo.

Sir:

Comfort Sisters' Corner

a desert, we have a central location in a very pretty, fertile valley which is a garden spot in reality, being irrigated from flowing wells. Mrs. West, in my former home the soil in our yard was sterile and I found that cactus plants would grow where nothing else would. Perhaps it is the same with you. The cacti grows in abundance here and many varieties. Many of them bloom at different seasons of the year and the flowers are very fragrant as well as beautiful. I think one can make such pretty pyramids and mounds using different varieties alternately. I would like to hear from you personally and learn more about "The Oasis." I should be glad to hear from any of the other sisters. I think it very helpful for us to meet in the "Cozy Corner" and exchange ideas.

With all good wishes for Mrs. Wilkinson and the COMFORT readers, I remain, MRS. R. W. MARSH.

WILEY, COLO.

DEAR SISTERS:

In reading the sisters' letters in last December COMFORT, Mrs. Lenora Holt's letter touched the question that lie nearest my heart in her talk on, "Is it right to teach children there is a Santa Claus?" I am going to make that question a little stronger even by stating it thus: "Is it right to even let children believe there is a Santa Claus?"

And I think you will all agree with me when you learn the heathenish origin of this Santa Claus and you will not want to link such a fable with the sacred birthday of Christ who said, "I am the Truth," for what is this Santa Claus which we add to His holy birthday, but a fable? And when traced down is one of the most heathenish, unreasonable fables ever taught or practised. Perhaps there are many who do not know the heathenish origin of Santa Claus. So for the benefit of those who do not I will relate it here and its use in different countries:

Away back in the fourth century there lived an Archbishop of Myra in Lycia, whose name was St. Nicholas. Among his own class he was considered a holy personage. He did good, helping those oppressed against the oppressor, the poor against the rich. He was supposed to have died December 6th 342 A. D., and his festival on the anniversary of that date is celebrated in Roman and Greek Catholic countries.

In Bari, a seaport on the southeastern cost of Italy, there is a subterranean building of Saracenic architecture. Beneath the superb church of St. Nicholas are the bones of the saint, Legend relates that these were originally buried in his own cathedral at Myra in Lycia; and that in the eleventh century they were stolen by certain merchants of Bari, who landed with them at that town on May 9, 1087 and handed them over to the archbishop and on that very day the bones were reburied in what was then the church of St. Stephen, then the church name was changed to St. Nicholas. There was supposed to have been thirty persons cured of various distempers by intercession of the St. Nicholas. Since that time the tomb of St. Nicholas of Bari has been famous for pilgrimages and to this day, the sixth of December draws hither pilgrims by the thousands, all with staves bound with olive and pine, many of them barefoot, all clad in picturesque, ancient costumes, devoted, earnest and fiery in memory of St. Nicholas. The sailors take the saint's image far out to sea, returning at nightfall with bonfires, torches and music. The bones of St. Nicholas are deposited in a sepulchre beneath the magnificent cyrpt, which is in itself a sort of subterranean church of rich Saracenic achitecture. Through the native rock, which forms the tomb, water constantly exudes, which is collected by the canons on a sponge attached to a reed, squeezed into bottles and sold to pilgrims as a miraculous specific, under the name of the "Manna of St. Nicholas."

Just stop and think of our own civilized Christian nation practising such heathenism as that.

If St. Nicholas was celebrated on the old, original day, December 6th, and kept apart from Christ it would not be quite so bad, but think of linking it to the most holy and sacred day of our lives, the day of the birth of our blessed Lord and Master.

Of course a lot of people, Christians at that, who have been practising this Santa Claus fable (the German diminutive for St. Nicholas) did not know its origin. But now, all who have read this know and cannot shut their eyes to the truth, for Christ said: "It is ye who sin—who know the right and walk not therein." So all you lovers of Christ and the truth, arise to help down one of the greatest enemies of Christianity now existing.

Someone will say: "Why, the children just love to hear about Santa Claus." Of course they do—any story, false or true, can be made attractive to the child. But how much more would they love the story of Jesus, if it were given as much time and thought as the story of Santa. And even though we go far enough to tell the child that it is only a man dressed up to represent St. Nicholas, even that detracts the child's mind from the real truth and teaches it to remember St. Nicholas (only a good man) when it should be remembering the Divine Christ.

I was talking to a lady about Santa and about it being wrong to teach it to children and she said "Hush" because a child of seven years was by her side. Question: Was she afraid the child would learn the truth, or was she afraid the child would find out she had been lying to it?

Just picture the dear little flexible minds, which God has given into our keeping to train for Him, cobwebbed with such fables, for their little minds are easily clouded and they are eager to grasp and believe anything we tell them.

The first to gain from and teach a child in the home is Respect—with a capital R—and no parent can hope to retain the respect of a child when the child finds out the parent has lied to it. If the child does retain its respect, then all honor to the child.

Some will say, "I taught my child Santa Claus, and look at him, a noble, Christian fellow." Just be-

Love and Spite

"I hunted high and low for your wife and child; if it had not been for that faithful fool there," pointing at Martha, standing silent behind Richard, "I should have been safe to this day. But how was I to know you had taken a servant into your confidence, or that she went straight from this house to the woman you said was your wife, that when Miss Barry left me Martha took her to the woman, who got her to promise she would care for the child till she was twenty-one, and would never let her know who she was, or that her father was a madman and a murderer.

"For I had that much revenge, Richard de Burgh! The woman who loved you died abhorring you."

She stopped, panting for breath, burned with the fires of hell that had been shut in her breast these many years.

Huntley spoke quickly, for Richard's face was ghastly at this worst blow of all.

"Don't go on, that's enough!" he said.

"There's more," she gasped, "and I will go on! You shall all hear it, all know what my life has been."

But for a minute her eyes closed, her face, all pinched and yellow, looked like that of a dying woman.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE CONFESSION.

"How do you know all this?"

Richard's face was nearly as pinched as Alicia's; at the sound of his broken voice, that had been pitiless, she unclosed her eyes and stared at him, gloating even now on his pain.

"Know?" she cried. "Hugo saw his old governess, Miss Barry, about a year ago, with a girl who looked so like Gilbert that he came to tell me, to ask me if it could be Richard's child. I sent him time and again to Miss Barry, to cajole her into telling who the girl was, or to send her to us; but she stuck to her bargain, she sent the girl away, and but for a mere chance, we should never have seen her. Hugo made certain she was Richard's child. Then he lo ked everywhere for her, and all the time she was here, come under a false name, to spy."

"I came by accident, because I wanted to get out of going to the Warden School, because Martha let out my name was De Burgh, and it seemed a chance to get to my own people," Jocelyn said quickly, but her lips trembled.

"I know how you came," evilly, "but it doesn't matter. Ever since you have been in this house things have been going against me. They have gone against me all my life, but I never was beaten before. I would not be beaten now if my heart had not died with my Hugo." She beat her hands on the coverlet.

"I've fought all my life," she moaned. "I never gave in, I never repented. Not when I found I had hurt my back lifting the old man to throw him from the window, and grew into the helpless cripple I am. Not when I knew that I feared the dark in which I had killed him, and had lights burning night and day, so that the twilight could never creep on me and make me see that sight over again. You think I am an old woman." She clutched Jocelyn's hand. "I am but fifty-seven. I tell you I have lived in hell for years." An awful shiver came over her.

"And it has been all for nothing," the dreary whisper more to herself than them. "They say Hugo is dead." She plucked with her fingers at the satin quilt.

Richard came a step nearer to her.

"And I?" he said slowly. "Have I not suffered? But I would forgive you all, Alicia, all, if my wife had not died believing me a villain and mad. When you married my father I never thought again of the day you said you loved me. I never loved you. I loved in all my life but one woman, and she was married to a brute who had deserted her. When he died I married her. Martha has the papers that my wife gave her when she died. We kept it secret, because my wife wished it, because she wanted to live a quiet life and not come to Castle de Burgh. I was a fool to do it. I might have known you meant mischief. But here, before Heaven, I forgive you, as I pray He may forgive you blacker sins than I have against you." In the solemn silence Alicia laughed.

"I have confessed to spite Gilbert, not for your forgiveness!" she cried. "Do what you like, now, hang me, tell it all abroad. For my son is dead."

Huntley stood by, his quick hand writing as she spoke.

"Sign this," he said gently, "and don't speak like that. No one will hang you, and you have Gilbert left."

Alicia lifted her eyes to his, and her look was devilish.

"My son is dead," she said, after that long glance of unconquerable malice. "Give me the pen. But first write this:

"I, Alicia de Burgh, do swear before Heaven that I alone killed my husband, Henry de Burgh, by pushing him from an open window; that the story told by the witness, Martha Hewitt, is true and would have been told at the trial but for me, who hurried the woman away by persuading her that it was the only way to save Richard de Burgh, whom I falsely accused of the murder; through me he was proven to have done it, and to have been of unsound mind. This my confession, I have caused to be written, not because I repent, but that Gilbert and Moyra de Burgh may know that they have no right to inherit the property."

She took the pen from Huntley, and slowly, laboriously signed her name.

Her hand fell heavily on the quilt, she relinquished the pen.

"Take me up, Willie Huntley," she said slowly, "and carry me to Hugo. You can come, too," her black, dull eyes turned on Jocelyn. "If I had known you before I might—but it's all no matter."

Very deftly Huntley stooped and folded the bed-clothes round the cripple; as he lifted her her emaciated face was yellow as wax against his shoulder, her eyes were purple round the lids. The gorgeous coverlet wrapped her like a sumptuous shroud, and Jocelyn followed with a heart full of pity.

Wicked as the woman was, she was strong in her wickedness. Who knew what she might have been if she had not loved "not wisely but too well," till her heart learned the worst bitterness that life holds?

They had laid Hugo de Burgh on his bed; the crimson wound in his throat was covered with white linen; his eyes some kindly hand had closed. Yet his dead face was dreadful. The white lips sneered still, as if in mockery. The fine, cruel hands were torn and bruised by the teeth of the great wolf-dog that had died to defend his master.

The doctor stood by the head of the bed. As Huntley came in, carrying the dead man's mother, he started and waved them back.

"Take her away, Lord Huntley!" he cried sharply. "The shock—she is not fit for it."

His quick eye, as he came forward hastily, noted the hang of Alicia's head on Huntley's shoulder, the lax arm that drooped over the gorgeous, trailing coverlet.

"Poor soul! Poor soul!" he said, almost absently. "I thought as much."

Huntley looked down at his burden.

"What do you mean?" he cried.

"Mrs. De Burgh is dead," Doctor Maitland said quietly. "The shock has done it, but for some time I have known it was not far off."

Huntley remembered how she had grown suddenly heavy in his arms as he walked. Very gently he laid her down beside the son whose dead face she would never look on, and straightened the rose and gold of her wrappings round her quiet limbs.

Mother and son had gone before a higher Judge than humanity. Jocelyn de Burgh, whom they had wronged, fell on her knees beside the bed and prayed.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

That night, when Moyra had cried herself to sleep, Jocelyn and Huntley talked long together. Together they determined that Moyra should never know what had been in that letter from Guy Meredith that the dead woman had never read.

"Guy will never tell her he wrote threatening Hugo with exposure; why should we? Let her be happy thinking he knows no more than she does," Huntley said.

For the letter had been but one more proof of Alicia's guilt.

Meredith's mother had written to him, begging him to give up Moyra, since she had thought for years that her grandmother murdered her husband, and lately had known she did.

A man who had been poaching was badly hurt in a fight with the Meredith keepers, and Mrs. Meredith had been sorry for him. Day after day she had visited him in the infirmary of the jail, till at last he had asked her to bring a magistrate; he had something to tell before he died.

He had been hanging round Castle De Burgh waiting to speak to a maid servant, who was his sweetheart, and was the first to pick up old Mr. De Burgh from the stones of the river that was shallow just there. And the old man had spoken.

"Alicia—Alicia pushed me," he said, as he died. The poacher went to Alicia and she laughed at him, but she paid his passage to Canada. He never went, for he was arrested for stealing, and he never told till he found he was dying. Then it weighed on him that he had left the innocent to suffer for the guilty. He made a deposition of all that he knew and swore to it.

But he lived still, a breathing, sensible witness of Alicia's guilt, and it was this man's confession that Guy Meredith had written to Huntley, vaguely and threateningly to Hugo.

"And me?" Jocelyn said, as Huntley stood up to say good night to her.

"What do you mean?" he asked abruptly, for she trembled as she faced him.

"I mean you had better let me go. I feel—I feel as if those two up-stairs had died through me."

"They died through the visitation of God, with their sins on them," he answered very gravely. "And you, my Jocelyn, must forget everything but that your troubles are over."

He took her gently to him.

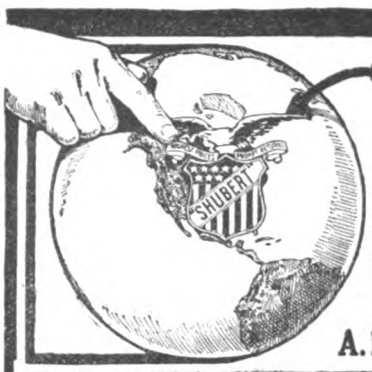
"My brave love," he said softly; "my brave, brave love!"

A year after things were changed, indeed, at Castle De Burgh.

The great house was shut up; there were none of them who would willingly live there. Certainly not Richard de Burgh, who had been cleared forever of the stain on his name, pardoned by the home secretary for the crime he had never committed, and justice done to him at last!

Not Gilbert, who had married Mollie Moore on his stepbrother's generous allowance and taken her to travel wherever she most longed to go. Not Moyra, who was to marry Guy Meredith in the spring, and lived now with Jocelyn.

For Jocelyn, her blue eyes bluer than ever, her lovely face sweet and untroubled, was Jocelyn de Burgh no longer, but Lady Huntley of Holycross. She was happy as she had never dreamed of happiness; and Richard de Burgh was happy at seeing her. Otherwise the man's heart was weary in his breast. He longed greatly for the day that should take him to that first Jocelyn, who had loved him and died thinking him a murderer. He lived quietly at a small house he had taken, near his daughter's grand one; and thought, as each day passed over his head, that it was one day gone from his long waiting, one day less to the time when he should meet his love and see in her clear eyes that in heaven she knew!



Miss Barry lived still in the dingy London house, hard and iron-gray still. She had never even thawed when Jocelyn had gone to her and thanked her for her care, begged her pardon for having thought hardly of her. She had never liked her. She did not pretend liking now; but there were tears in her old eyes as she told Richard de Burgh how she had kept her word to his wife. For Richard had always known the way to the cold woman's heart.

But Miss Barry lived without Martha. Martha, who had kept house for her beloved Mr. Richard, and would till death claimed her, a "very faithful servant, to shine as doth the day."

And the real Jane Brown?

Was made happy with a school of her own, till in after days she married well and happily. But she and the sham Jane Brown have never met since they parted in the ladies' carriage at Chester.

THE END.

How and Where to Sell Your Furs

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE sale of the trapper's collection of furs has been greatly aided by the large fur houses who make a business of advertising for furs, sending price lists through the mails and doing all the business without greeting the trapper face to face.

A number of such firms have their advertisements in this paper, and a trapper may have every confidence in the advertisers in COMFORT doing exactly as they promise, and will do well to ship his furs to any of the different companies and get the highest, market prices.

The market value of raw furs formerly depended almost entirely on foreign demand. Prices were fixed at the great auction sales in London. These are held four times a year; in January, March, June and October. Three firms of auctioneers conduct the sales. They are C. M. Lampson and Company, A. and W. Nesbitt and Frederick Huth and Company. Aside from the auction houses, that famous fur company of the Canadian wilds, the Hudson Bay Company, held a sale in January and March.

The war has caused many changes. The Hudson Bay Company has abandoned its sales. The London sales, while still held, lack the support of German buyers, the principal factors in the European fur trade.

Germany, blockaded on all sides by the Allies, has been able to secure but little furs in the two years gone by, and were the war to end, she would again predominate in fixing market values.

Auction sales of furs are now held in New York and St. Louis, conducted by firms in a manner similar to those held in London. They have been largely patronized in the past year, and no doubt will do much to maintain high values in all American furs until the war's end.

Some trappers doubt the wisdom of shipping furs but these are in the minority. Those who ship to the large firms are nearly always certain to receive the full, market value. In dealing with the small home town buyer, as a rule, he buys as cheaply as possible, in order to increase his own profit when he ships. Therefore, if the trapper will ship he will secure the same prices as the home town buyer and realize the profit that would have been the other fellow's, had the skins been disposed of at home.

A trapper who is in doubt about the responsibility of the firm to whom he ships his furs, should instruct the firm to hold his lot of furs separate, so if returns are not satisfactory, the shipment may be returned. In this way, he runs no chances of being compelled to accept a valuation less than he considers the worth of his shipment. There are some houses that hold all shipments separate, but most fur houses do not do so unless requested. It takes a vast warehouse to hold all shipments separate, and in the large cities, rents are much too high to utilize space for such purposes.

The fur grader in the large fur houses is working hard to please the trapper. The grader knows that if the trapper is not pleased, he will not ship again. It is the aim and desire of any reputable fur house to hold its shippers. Every firm wants all the furs it can get, and by increasing the shippers, the business is enlarged and made more prosperous.

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

VETERINARY QUESTIONS.—What is the normal temperature of the horse? (2) Where is the temperature taken? (3) How many days does the mare carry her foal? (4) How many openings are there in the teat of a mare? (5) Is a black horse that color when born? (6) How long does it take for a horse's hoof to grow down at the toe? (7) At what age is a horse mature or adult? (8) The molar teeth wear down daily. Why is this not noticeable? (9) What is the capacity of a horse's stomach? (10) Where does a horse store drinking water? (11) How long does feed take to pass through a horse? MISS F. H.

A.—We believe we asked these questions in an editorial article with the hope that our readers would hunt up the answers for themselves. 100 degrees. (2) Angle of lower jaw. (3) 336 days. (4) Two. (5) No. Brown. (6) About thirteen months. (7) Five years. (8) The teeth descend in their sockets as they wear off. (9) Five and one half gallons. (10) First large intestine, called "cocum." (11) About five days.

CANKER OF THE EAR.—I have a Water Spaniel dog, suffering from a running of the head. The odor is offensive. MRS. A. L.

A.—Twice daily perfectly cleanse the ear with peroxide of hydrogen or wood alcohol on cotton tied to a small stick. Then lay the dog on its side and pour into the ear that is uppermost a little of a lotion composed of one dram each of powdered alum and sugar of lead, two drops of carbolic acid, thirty drops of glycerine and soft water two ounces. Hold the dog down until the sediment has time to settle into the ear, then treat the other ear in the same way. Let the dog live an outdoor life on simple food and keep him out of water. The trouble is due to lack of drying of the ears when wet.

SHRINK IN MILK.—I have a cow, part Jersey, six years old. I milked her within a week of her freshening. When the calf came she didn't give enough milk for it. What is the cause? J. O. B.

A.—A cow should always be dried off for at least six weeks before calving and then will be likely to give a good flow of milk if in good condition and well fed. Nothing can be done to improve matters other than to feed well and dry her off six weeks or more before the next calf is due.

WEAK RABBITS.—We have some young rabbits about two months old which let one ear fall down. They eat and seem to be well and are fed twice each day. In the morning they have green Alfalfa and bread and milk and fresh water; in the evening they have dry Alfalfa hay and sometimes cabbage, carrots and lettuce as a change. Is this a disease? MRS. W. A. L.

A.—Disease is not present. Make the rabbits take plenty of exercise to give them muscular strength.

INDIGESTION.—I have a seven-year-old mare in poor condition. Her hind legs began to stock years ago, when in foal. They stock worse after standing a little or after a long drive. Her feed is ground oats and meal, half and half. She has rock salt before her all the time. L. E. G.

A.—Have her teeth attended to by a veterinarian and then feed whole oats, one ninth part of wheat bran by weight and mixed clover hay. Add ear corn in winter. Allow her a box stall and each time she comes in rub her legs dry and bandage snugly with flannel from feet to hocks and knees. Never let her stand for a single day idle in the stable. If she passes worms give the treatment often prescribed in this department.

AILING CATTLE.—What is the matter with my cattle? They began dying two years ago. They get weak in their backs and can't rise up. Some look healthy, eat and drink and some do not eat at all. They die from suffocation and when examined the third stomach is all dry. What should be done to prevent others from catching the disease? MRS. D. S.

A.—You may be sure that improper feed and management explain these troubles. If at all times the cattle have an abundance of sound, nutritious feeds and plenty of pure water and succulent or laxative feed to keep the bowels active no such sickness or losses will occur. Prevention is the important matter to consider.

SHEDDING HAIR.—I have a young spitz dog that sheds her hair all the year around. Is this a natural condition and is there a way to stop it? D. K.

A.—This will not happen if you make the dog live an active outdoor life and have but one small meal a day, without sweets or potatoes. Keep the dog free from fleas. If necessary tub him once a week in a solution of coal tar dip made according to directions given upon the container.

SKIN DISEASE.—I have a horse four years old that has a skin trouble. His hair comes out in spots all over him. One eye gets red and bloodshot. J. W. T.

A.—Have the horse clipped and clip him again in spring wash affected parts of skin with a 1-100 solution of coal tar dip thickened with sulphur and repeat every three days. Reduce grain feed and increase work or exercise daily. The eye trouble probably is periodic ophthalmia (moon blindness) and incurable. See answers on that subject in back numbers of the paper.

SYNOVIAL DISTENSIONS.—I have a young colt eighteen months old, in good health. He has wind puffs on his left hind leg in the knee joint. Can you advise me what to use? D. F. Y.

A.—The distensions are filled with synovia (joint oil), not wind, and constitute a bog spavin in front of the hock joint and a thoroughpin which appears at each side of the joint. The condition is practically incurable. Coat the joint with pine tar (if not sore from liniment) and let colt run out. Repeat the application each time the tar is about worn off.

TAIL RUBBING.—I have a four-year-old mare in good condition, but rubs the root of her tail. She hasn't any breaking out and does not rub the hair off. I have given medicine for all kind of worms. W. L. N.

A.—Reduce the feed and work or abundantly exercise the filly every day. Cleanse the tail. Pull upon locks of the upstanding hair of the rubbed part until the skin gives with a crack. Pour on and rub in a mixture of one part of kerosene and two parts of cottonseed oil every three days until no longer needed. Cleanse udder and on each side of it if found to be foul.

SNEEZING.—I have a heifer eighteen months old that goes to a post and rubs her nose on it and sneezes for a half hour at a time. She looks well, eats heartily and has free range of a pasture. It is not contagious as she has been with the other cows. MRS. W. Z. D.

A.—The cow possibly has a little discharge fom the nostrils or a growth in one of them which causes her to sneeze. Try effects of syringing out the nostrils twice daily with lukewarm water containing one teaspoonful of saleratus to the quart.

RICKETS.—I have pigs, two months old, that walk on their ankle joints when they hurry. They seem to be weak over their hind quarters. I feed them corn and bran slops. S. P.

A.—Lack of exercise and malnutrition induce this disease of the bones. Worms may be an aggravating cause. Pigs should have very little bran. It is too irritating to the bowels. Corn is best kept for feeding the grown pigs for market. Turn the pigs loose on Alfalfa. Or allow free range and feed Alfalfa hay. Also feed slop of wheat middlings, ground barley or rye, and 10 per cent of tankage. Allow free access to slaked lime, wood ashes and wood charcoal.

LAMENESS.—Will you tell me what is the matter with my horse? He is nine years old and is lame on his hind leg and has a tumor on the stifle joint. It looks like sweeney but the skin is not tight. J. F. S.

A.—Sweeney is wasting of the muscles of the shoulder and has no connection with a tumor of any kind. Write again giving a clear description of the case and enclose a picture of a horse marked to show the location of the trouble.

WIND-BROKEN MARE.—I have a fine mare twelve years old. When you drive her it seems hard for her to get her breath. When she is doing nothing she appears all right. Is there any cure? MRS. M. H. O.

A.—We cannot tell from your description whether the mare is a "roarer" or affected with heaves (broken wind). There is no cure for either disease. If you can find out exactly what is wrong and write again we may be able to suggest some treatment that may help.

LEAKING MILK.—What can be done for a cow when her teats leak milk, without injury to the cow?
W. J. H.

A.—Milk the cow three or four times a day and twice daily soak her teats in a saturated solution of alum.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

cause the child found you out, forgave you, and lived it down, does that lighten your responsibility? Not in the least. If I should tell a lie to some dear friend and they should find it out, fogive me and live it down, would that lighten the crime for me? Not in the least.

People go to the trouble to make up big fable stories about Santa Claus, but will not read the plain truth to the children to get them to believe in Christ.

Even from a worldly standpoint, the child would respect the parents more if it thought they gave the gifts to it.

And we have gone so far that the missionaries—I hope not all—teach Santa Claus. It is a wonder they can ever convert the skeptic heathen when he learns we are practising customs just as dark in heathenism as any of their old, handed down, witchery customs.

Ask a child who is the most important person at Christmas-time and nine times out of ten they will say "Santa Claus." The dark blanket of Santa Claus is held up before the child's eyes until Chist is hidden entirely. I have seen Christmas programs carried out in churches and the name of Christ not even mentioned, but old Santa was there in all his glory, or if not entirely forgotten, Christ was used merely as a side issue, so to speak.

Someone says, "If you are starting to reform the world you will find it a great task, there are so many evils and fables in the world today." We cannot down them all at one time. As the old man on his death bed told his sons, "The son who can break this bundle of sticks which I have tied together may have all my money." They all tried, but one, but could not break them. Then the last, and least, son took them and said, "That is easy," and broke them one at a time.

That is the way some people look at the evils of the world—all in one large bundle. Separate them, analyze, and then break them one at a time.

Your COMFORT sister, MISS FLOY SCOTT.

YATES CENTER, KANS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

After reading Mrs. Ida Bell Aldridge's letter I thought I would add my mite.

First and foremost don't try to force religion upon a child. In place of the prayer (preceded by punishment) choose some interesting story, at first one containing no preaching and read it to the child, after giving him a wholesome supper, a bath and a clean nightgown. Let him go to bed or sit in a chair as he pleases. Sometimes my youngsters just lounge around on the floor while I read. The Cubby Bear stories in COMFORT are hard to beat. I also take several magazines for children from three to twelve years of age.

If I were going to deal with your child the first thing I should look to would be his diet. A doctor who was a very dear friend of mine, was at my home one time and noticed how disagreeable and peevish my children were. He said, "Mattie" (he had known me since I was eight yeas old), "you are feeding those children to temper if not to death." I was shocked for they were as healthy and plump looking as could be and had bright eyes and rosy cheeks. I asked why he thought that. He said, "No child so physically perfect should be so peevish and fretful." Then he told me how to feed them. For breakfast, a slice of buttered toast, preferably brown or graham bread, an egg, soft boiled, poached, or better still, raw. Don't throw up your hands in dismay. Beat the egg well (in a cup) finish filling the cup with fresh milk, add a bit of salt, one quarter to one half teaspoonful of sugar and a few drops of any desired flavoring extract, if desired, and you have a drink that is perfectly nutritious for we all know milk and eggs are a perfect food and at the same time are very palatable and digestible. After my eighteen months' old baby had the measles he would not eat anything and if he did he would vomit almost immediately. I tried the milk and egg diet and it worked splendidly.

For dinner, rice cooked in a double boiler from one and a half to three hours; cook in milk if you choose. Oatmeal cooked the same way is good, with a fruit sauce, not too acid, bread and butter with a light dessert like corn-starch pudding (if the child is over two years old), tapioca pudding, Indian meal pudding, cooked slowly and thoroughly. In winter a small amount of meat may be added.

For supper, corn-meal mush (cooked several hours), any good soup, or even popcorn and milk is much relished at our house. Never feed a child hot bread. The doctor said bread should be forty-eight hours old before giving it to a child but one cannot always live up to that.

Many people do not know that a child under eighteen months of age cannot digest potatoes or any food containing a large amount of starch. This is meant as a suggestive bill of fare and not to be followed too literally. Chocolate and cocoa furnish nourishment and many pleasant combinations can be worked out. Meat broths are also very nourishing.

The next thing I would do with that boy of yours would be to praise him but not notice anything he did even though it may be done with the intention of aggravating you. If he finds that you don't notice such things they will lose their charm at once. Let him alone as much as possible but treat him kindly always and if physical punishment is absolutely necessary be very, very sure that no hint of anger is displayed by you for that will only make matters worse and be ready with a kiss and smile, even in the midst of the punishment, and tell the little fellow how bad you feel because you have to punish him. I hope you do feel badly too, for I always do and I have actually cried as I talked to my little ones after punishing them.

Another scheme I tried about the work question was this: My little boy was like the child described in Mrs. A's letter and so lazy he would not do anything unless actually forced to One day I said, "Husband, go out in the yard and see if you can find a little boy who will bring mother some wood. Her little boy doesn't like to do it." A smile lighted up our little boy's face and in a few minutes he was back with the wood. We have much fun over our "make-believe" boy.

I never hire my children to do anything but all the pennies they get go into their banks and at Christmas they write a letter to Santa Claus telling what they want and then give me the pennies to take to him. They always get what they write for, even if mother wears last winter's hat. Of course we always talk these things over and they usually decide to get what they need. Last year it was a "wagon to haul wood in." This year it is to be a pig and Santa can put whatever he wants to in their stockings if he has anything left after he has seen the other little boys and girls. Last spring I gave them twenty-five cents each if they would keep the papers and trash picked up off the yard. They raked and swept the yard once a week and didn't need reminding all summer.

Suppose some morning you tell your boy that if he will help you, get the wood, feed the chickens, or any light task you may have for him to do, and help you get your work done that after dinner you would take a lunch and go fishing or on a picnic and go, no matter what it costs. But if something happens that makes it impossible, explain kindly the reason and arrange for another day, and don't be vexed at a little pouting or a few tears for such disappointments are as hard for the little folks as those of life are to us.

And first, last and always, don't expect an angel of a good healthy boy. I have known many a wayward son, who, in my opinion, was made so by his mother constantly showing him his faults, in all kindness, too, but my adage is:

"Do not look for wrong or evil,
You will find them if you do;
As you measure to your neighbor
He will measure back to you.
Look for goodness, look for gladness,
You will find them all the while,
If you bring a smiling visage to the glass
You'll meet a smile."

Now dear Mrs. Aldridge I will close, hoping I have helped you for I realize your anxiety. This is not theory with me but actual experience. I had a boy like yours but thanks to my doctor friend, my husband and I now have as loyal and loving a little son as we could wish for. MRS. GEORGE A. STEELE.

HABBERTON, ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Have you room for another homesteader? I have noticed several in the corner from time to time. We have been holding down forty acres for two years and hope in one more to call it our own. We are thirteen miles from town and one mile from the main road and one and one half miles from church and school. Our climate is lovely; the winters mild and while the summers are hot the nights are never uncomfortable and one can always find a breeze in the shade during the hot days. We are in the Ozarks and have the best water on earth.

We came to our claim with only a tent and camp equipment. Not a horse, cow or wagon and very little money. But my husband had a good sharp axe. Did I hear someone whisper, "It can't be did!" We haven't starved yet and won't till the smokehouse is empty—yes, it's locked. We have a one-room loghouse and there wasn't time to hew or bark them but they keep out considerable cold and we hope to add a room soon. Husband and I were both raised in town but prefer farm life and have learned some hard lessons in the school of experience. We lost our meat last fall. Just a week from the day we butchered I boiled out all the grease for soap and have plenty of soap and it was the first lesson in soap making too.

I enjoy the sisters' letters and hope I may come again. I have a twenty months old boy and read with great interest letters from other mothers.

With best wishes to all, I am, MRS E. A. WATSON.

ANSONIA, 186 Wakelee Ave., CONN.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I just read MRS. Aldridge's letter and feel like adding my mite.

Do not whip your child to make him say his prayers. Coax him lovingly, try the shortest prayer you know and if that won't do, let him alone about it. Maybe you might try asking it for him yourself, or you could tell him stories about Jesus and how He loves the little ones and cares for them.

I have never had any trouble with my children in that way for I commenced to teach them as soon as they were able to talk. It may be different with my baby who is twenty-one months old. I try to make her say grace after meals but instead she stands up in her high chair, folds her hands and says, "Gong, gong, pie," or whatever she has just eaten, meaning that it is all gone. It was a joy to us all when she came for the other baby was then ten years old and there is a boy and a girl older. They are a great help in taking care of the baby and also help to spoil her. Her name is Elizabeth Louise.

I believe it is best to whip a child in early years if it needs punishment but after they are ten years of age I think they ought to obey because they are old enough to understand.

My baby had a blood tumor on her back and I have painted it with spirits of camphor and sweet oil almost ever since she was born and it is nearly gone now. I am thankful to COMFORT for the remedy.

I look about the same as I did when I wrote to COMFORT before, three and seven years ago, only a little older but feel younger. I am thirty-five years old. I have made many pen friends through COMFORT and have taken the paper eleven years now. That speaks for it.

Mrs. Hanna Walker, California, I should like to hear from you again.

With love to all the COMFORT readers and the editor of this corner, MRS. HERMINE HANSEN.

TERRE HAUTE, R. R., IND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

May a new subscriber be admitted to your circle? I have read COMFORT a little over a year now and how I do enjoy the letters that are printed each month.

Where in the world Mrs. Hanna gets her idea that a poor family with children to rear and educate, has more advantages in the city than in the country is more than I can conceive. A poor family in the city is all right, in a way, as long as the husband and father is well and strong and the weekly wages (hard earned) come in each week, and then it takes a lot of figuring and skimping of this and that to make both ends meet in these times. But if the man of the house is out of work, what then? Rent to pay, fuel and food to buy, and a bunch of healthy youngsters can eat a lot of food. When the mechanic is out of work

Girls—Here Is A Beautiful Home For All Your Dollies

This Big Doll House Is Just What You Have Always Wanted

Looks Just Like A Real House With Yard, Flowers And Windows And Doors That Actually Open And Shut

Premium No. 7921

COMFORT loves little children and never loses an opportunity to please them, so when we had this large magnificent doll house offered us at a special reduced price you may be sure that we took up all that we could buy of them. You never saw a finer doll house than this one. It is not one of the small toy-like affairs that are not large enough to be of any account when you want to really and truly "play house." You will be surprised and delighted to see how much like a real house it looks and with the large size of it—over one foot high, a foot long, nearly ten inches wide, and of course the door-yard that extends clear around the house makes it still larger, and it looks like a real yard, too, with beautiful flower beds laid out, walks and handsome green climbing vines that come way up over the windows. It is built of very heavy folding cardboard in true colonial style just like the houses that rich people live in, with a large porch, plenty of windows that open outward, and doors that actually open and shut. The sides of the house and the chimney are painted a handsome bright red, the roof is light green while all the windows and doors are finished in white.

No little girlie ever had a larger or prettier doll house than this one and all your dollies will certainly feel very proud of such a beautiful home to live in. We are certainly pleased that we are able to make so many little ones happy with a present of one of these fine houses, and we are sure that every mother who sends for one will be as well pleased as the children. We will give you this doll house which comes all folded and ready to easily set up all ready for housekeeping, upon the terms of either of the following special offers.

Offer No. 7921A For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25c, we will send you this large beautiful doll house free by parcel post prepaid.

Offer No. 7921B For your own subscription, or renewal, or extension of your present subscription, for one year at 25c and 10c additional, (35c in all) we will send you this doll house free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7921.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

By the slip of a paragraph we answered A. H. Stillwater, Minn., in October COMFORT that Miss Marion May, 215 West 101st Street, New York, was the Secretary of the Anti-suffragist Association, when the fact is that she is Corresponding Secretary of the N. Y. State Woman Suffrage Association with the same address. The Secretary of the Anti-suffrage Association of New York is Mrs. M. E. Loomis, with headquarters in New York City. We extend our apologies to Miss May with the assurance that all the Antis who have written, or may write, to her, are just what she is looking for as material to work on, and that she never would have heard from them except for our mistake.

Mrs. A. K., Vassar, Mich.—The reason the skins, on which you have tried several methods of tanning, are stiff and harsh is not the fault of the method, but of the tanner. You are trying to do something you do not know how to do, except as far as you have been told. Tanning properly depends more on the tanner than on the method and to be anything at all of a tanner requires knowledge and practise. We might tell you a different, perhaps a better, method than any you have tried, but we cannot give you the necessary ability and experience to apply the method. COMFORT readers along other lines ask us the same kind of questions you do about methods to use, but they do not seem to think it is necessary to know anything except the method. A skilled person in any work with the poorest method will get better results than the unskilled person can get with the best method known. We hope inquirers will make a note of this when they fail to get results and look to the improvement of themselves instead of the methods they may be failing to make good with.

T. R. N., Everton, Mo.—There are city newspapers which publish a certain number of "Want Notices" free, but we know none except The Enquirer, Cincinnati, O. Inquire of N. W. Ayer & Son, Advertising Agents, Philadelphia, Pa. (2) Walker's Rhyming Dictionary is the standard, but it cannot teach you how to write songs and poems, nor can any book. Poets are born, not made. There are many books on the use of words. Try Trench or Fyffe. Inquire at any large book store. Ask for lists of books on the subject.

Mrs. N. B., Nickelsville, Va.—You can only sell your apple logs by bringing them to the notice of possible purchasers and the best way to do that is to advertise in your local, or nearest city, papers. COMFORT inquirers often ask us for information concerning firms which buy certain lines of farm and other products and we cannot give it because in small sales of this kind business can only be done with local or near-by city dealers, or purchasers. These can best and quickest be reached by local advertising and as the cost is small we recommend all inquirers to go to their own immediate newspapers for this.

J. C. S., Noma, Fla.—Old magazines are a drug on the market and unless you can sell them at a cent or two apiece you will not find dealers willing to purchase. Thousands of them can be bought at second-hand stands in the cities at prices ranging from two for a nickel up to a dime apiece in rare instances. We bought not long ago from a second-hand dealer three bound volumes of Harper's Magazine date 1850-51 in good condition for a dime. Can you beat that? At another time we saw a dealer buy a whole wheelbarrow load of old, unbound magazines for fifteen cents. The same weight of unprinted paper would have brought more money.

Mrs. M. B. W., Library, Penn.—The straight prohibition states are Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Georgia, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Mississippi, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, Washington and West Virginia. You may not have seen this list in COMFORT, but it has been there just the same, and we believe more than twice. We hope you will see it this time.

N. L. A., Brookwood, Ala.—Girls may learn to become prescription drug clerks, but not a great many do, as the work is not in all particulars quite woman's work. Where pharmacy is taught in Alabama is probably at the State University. We leave it to you to find out where that is located. Write to the President, C. H. Denny, LL. D., for information. In the mean time have a talk with some physician and druggist whom you know and get their opinion of your taking up the study of pharmacy. What the educational requirements are in Alabama to enter the school you can learn from the physician, or the druggist.

Miss P. T., Wakefield, Va.—This is an age of efficiency, and if you do not even know the duties of a governess, how could you fill the position of governess if we told you where you could get such a position, which we cannot. Such positions are found by capable persons who know what is to be done, how to do it and what to do to get it to do. The ability to be a first-class governess carries with it the ability to find the place. If you have to be led to it, you will have to be led after you get it. The efficient governess does not require to be led because she is a leader. Begin your inquiries among families in your neighborhood who have employed governesses.

B. M. C., Anna, Ill.—As a great many COMFORT readers, men and women, make things to sell and don't know how to sell them, we will go into some detail as to how to handle your wonderful hair tonic. First give it a good name. Trade-mark is not necessary, nor is there any government license to sell. But a trade-mark is desirable. If there is any local license you must find that out by inquiry of local officials. Put your tonic up neatly and attractively, and when you have a stock ready for distribution place it with drug-stores and groceries on sale, that is they only pay you for what they sell. Now to let the public know about the wonderful tonic and what a good thing it is, advertise it liberally, half page, at least, at a time and often, in your local newspapers. That will start something and you will reap the benefit. When you have got it going all right in your own county, place it in the adjoining county and advertise in the newspapers of that county, and so on until you have it going in all the adjoining counties. In this small and gradual way you may build up a very comfortable business and possibly, if the tonic becomes popular, sell out to a corporation which sees enough in the business to spend real money on it. There are so many medicines and other articles now on the market, that to get before a wide public costs a mint of money in advertising and nothing will go unless it is well advertised. You can meet the cost in one county to begin with, but in the whole state and country you cannot. Therefore begin at the bottom and climb up as you gain strength. You will not find it easy work, even going at it in the smallest way, and you will make many mistakes before you learn how, but if you will stick to it and keep it going you may get there by and by, and you may not.

Brown Eyes, Central, Ind.—We imagine that you are not the only pupil in the public schools of this country who finds it difficult to meet the cost of changing text-books and thus far the cause of complaint is not being removed as thoroughly as it should be. As Indiana prides herself on her public schools and the high intellectual standard of her people you might get somebody in authority interested in your case so that you would not have to leave school because you could not afford to buy new books when ordered to do so by teachers acting under orders from those higher up. Suppose you write a plain letter of your needs and your desire to secure an education, to Hon. Chas. A. Greathouse, State Superintendent of Education at Indianapolis and ask him what can be done for you. If he can offer no assistance, we suppose you will have to do the best you can on your own hook. At the same time, it seems to us that your parents must be poorer than in purse merely, to permit their daughter to grow up in ignorance rather than make some sacrifice to prevent it.

BIGGEST BOOK IN WORLD.—A committee headed by one George Skal of New York has been formed to have made up and presented to the German people a great book containing the newspaper clippings on the voyage of the merchant submarine Deutschland. The book will be inscribed in letters of gold and will be placed in the Royal Library in Berlin. It will contain every line printed concerning the undersea voyage of the Deutschland, as well as editorial comment, photographs, and cartoons. The book will be about the size of a grand piano. The volume is to rest on a table supported by two American eagles and two German eagles of silver.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Apply to the hair twice a week until it becomes the desired shade. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and removes dandruff. It is excellent for falling hair and will make harsh hair soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off.—Adv.

26-Piece Daisy SILVER SET

Premium No. 6806

Sent To You Prepaid For A Club Of Six

WARRANTED FOR FIVE YEARS

WE have in the past made many offers of table ware, but this is the first time we have ever been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for such a small club of subscriptions. And please don't think that because we are giving away this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. This Set which we offer you here is plated on a white metal base therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and decorated with the beautiful Daisy design which is now so popular and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished.

It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have ever offered, in fact we are so sure that it will please and satisfy all who accept this offer we are going to guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this beautiful 26-Piece Daisy Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Daisy Table Set Free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 6806.

Big Package Beautiful Christmas Novelties!

52 All Different Lovely Gold And Color Embossed Christmas Enclosure Cards, Folders, Cut-Outs, Seals, Stickers, Tags, Etc.,

Premium No. 7931

All Sent Postpaid To You For Only One Subscription

Also An Exquisite Christmas Calendar For 1917!

All the latest new style Christmas novelties, beautifully printed and embossed on superfine paper in gold, purple, crimson, holly-green and all the colors of the rainbow. The use of these dainty, appropriate emblems of holiday cheer is now almost universal—everyone realizes how much these refined little cards, tags, seals, stickers, etc. add to the value of the Christmas gift. Even though it may be only a little remembrance these bright colored tokens of Joy and Happiness show that loving thought has gone into it and care and pains have been taken with it and this knowledge changes the plainest, most inexpensive present into a gift well nigh priceless.

The ordinary small town stores do not carry these strictly high-grade Christmas novelty packages—they are to be secured only in the large cities and at a high price. So for the benefit of COMFORT readers we had this special assortment made up expressly for us by one of the largest and best known Christmas novelty manufacturers in America. And in order to give the greatest value possible we had them add to the assortment a most beautiful 1917 Christmas Calendar 4½ inches wide by 6½ inches long, lithographed in no less than five colors on heavy white coated specially prepared paper. This Calendar alone is worth all that we ask you to send us for the whole collection—and you will say so too when you see it.

Now let us tell you what this big assortment contains:

One Extra Large Colored and Holly Embossed "Christmas Stocking" Enclosure Card.

Five Large Elegantly Embossed and Colored Christmas Enclosure Cards.

Ten Medium Embossed and Colored Christmas Enclosure Cards.

Two Large Handsomely Colored and Decorated Christmas Tags.

Four Medium colored and Decorated Christmas Tags.

One Extra Large Colored and Holly Embossed Christmas Book Mark.

One Beautiful Extra Large Colored and Embossed Christmas Novelty Cut-out Card.

Two Dainty Colored and Embossed Novelty Cut-out Christmas Folders.

Ten Beautifully Colored and Embossed Santa Claus, Evergreen, Poinsettia, and Christmas Bells Gummed Seals.

One Special Large Oval Illustrated Gold Embossed and Colored Christmas Gummed Seal with the words "Do Not Open Until Chistmas."

Five Novelty Santa Claus Cut-out Christmas Gummed Seals, Embossed in colors.

Ten Cute Novelty Children Cut-out Christmas Gummed Seals.

One Artistic, Beautifully Embossed and Finished Christmas Calendar for 1917.

All the Enclosure Cards, Tags, and Folders carry a Cheery Christmas Greeting such as "Merry Christmas," "With Best Christmas Wishes," "Christmas Greetings," "Merry Yuletide," "Christmas Joys" and others equally as pleasing and appropriate. These are to be tied to or enclosed inside your Christmas packages to bear a loving message with the gift. And all the gaily colored gummed Stamps and Seals you will use to seal and decorate the outside of your Christmas letters and packages as well. You will be surprised and delighted to see how much they add to the attractiveness of your gifts to say nothing of the fun in "doing them up."

And don't forget that in addition to all of these lovely cards, seals, tags, stickers, etc., we are also going to send an exquisitely embossed and multi-colored Christmas Calendar for 1917, a large handsome Holly decorated Book Mark and two large Christmas Novelty Cut-out Folders which are as unique as they are pleasing. When you first look at one of them it is to all appearances a handsome Christmas Post Card and the other a very attractive four page Booklet, when Presto—a flip of the finger, and a startling transformation takes place, causing the figures and designs to stand out in bold relief, and in a life-like manner that is truly wonderful. These cute novelties are something entirely new this season and they make very attractive center-table or mantlepiece ornaments as they are large and stand without support.

This splendid collection will furnish your whole family with all the Holiday Gift Decorations needed for this Christmas and they will surely add to the pleasure of your giving and the gifts themselves will be all the more appreciated by the recipients. We purchased a large quantity of these Novelty Packages but even at that we fear we have not enough to go around so take no chances of being disappointed but send in your order at once. Also Christmas will be here almost before you are aware of it, and you want to make sure of receiving your package in time so that you can get your Christmas packages all ready before Christmas Day.

We will send you this package of beautiful Christmas Novelties including the large Handsome Christmas Calendar for 1917 upon the terms of either one of the following very liberal offers:

Offer No. 7931A. For one one-year's subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you this big package of beautiful Christmas Novelties free by mail postpaid.

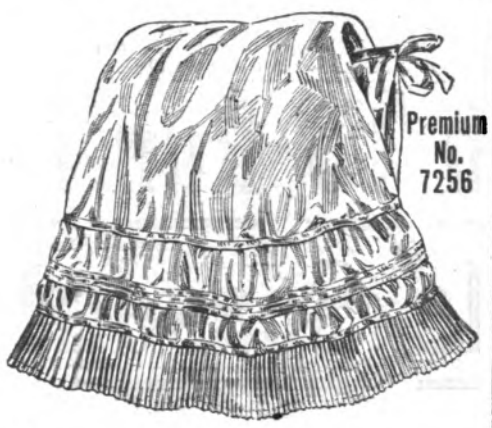
Daisy Water Pistol

Premium No. 7901



Given For One Subscription

THIS is the largest and most powerful water pistol on the market, manufactured by the Daisy Manufacturing Company, makers of the famous Daisy air rifle. In shape, size and appearance it looks exactly like a .32 automatic "Colt" having a regular full-size checkered butt and 5½ inch barrel with a handsome blued steel finish over all, and it squirts a solid stream of water thirty feet or more straight to the mark you aim it at. It works by compressed air—there are no rubber bulbs to wear out. To load the "Daisy" you simply pull the trigger back as far as it will go—hold it there—immerse the end of the barrel in water—then release the trigger slowly. To shoot it you give the trigger a quick pull just the same as you would a regular revolver. This liquid pistol serves two purposes—loaded with a weak solution of dilute aqua ammonia it is a good protection against vicious dogs, tramps, burglars, etc. Loaded with water it is perfectly harmless and the greatest fun maker out. Boys and girls can have literally "barrels of fun" with it by giving their friends surprise shower baths when they least expect them. We will send the Daisy Water Pistol free to any address upon the terms of either one of the following offers:

Offer No. 7901A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you the Daisy Water Pistol free by parcel post prepaid.

Offer No. 7901B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription to COMFORT for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all) we will send you the Daisy Water Pistol free and prepaid. Premium No. 7901. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

HERE we are once more at the last month of the year and the year is 1916, meaning much to many people and something to every human being. Some have been good and some ill, some have been rewarded and some punished, but you girls and I seem to be about as usual, don't we? Not much richer, not much poorer, not much happier, not much sadder and we ought to thank the good Lord that we are still able to be fair average human beings in a world very much as we have made it. What 1917 will bring to us, no one can tell, and if any one could, he would be a monster if he did, so let us say good by to the Old Year and shout welcome to the New. In the mean time, watch me go to work!

The first letter I take from the pile before me is from Lonesome Maid of Piney Ford, Ohio, and she wants to know if I think a young man, who says he will write and does not and says he will call and does not, cares for her as much as she does for him. If she cares so little for him that she doesn't care whether she ever sees him again or not, then I should say he cares as much for her as she does for him. Why is it a girl will not take a snub from a man unless he simply slams it at her? P. S. Ohio has the ceputation of having fine schools, but, my, my, they certainly don't show any signs in Cousin Lonesome's letter. I don't wonder that the young man didn't want to get any more letters from her.

Brown Eyes, Baltimore, Md.—As your nagging brother drove two of your sisters away from home and they married and you are engaged and he has begun to nag you, why don't you do as they did? You say you are almost driven to desperation at home, yet you insist on staying there when you have a chance to go away. It must be a very mild form of desperation, or you are making much of very little. Some folks do that, you know.

Broken Heart, De Funiak Springs, Fla.—I'll tell you what you do, cousin, for your broken heart because of the very common man you love and you are a very wealthy girl. You forget him and spend quite a lot of your money on spelling books, grammars and other educational articles and every break in your heart will be mended so it will be just as good as new.

M. J. A. B., Adams, Mass.—I think, my dear, you have made a mistake in your associate who is too ignorant to know when she is doing you an injury by her talk to you and about you. She may not mean any harm, but what difference is that if she does the harm? She might not intentionally give you poison, but if she did, not knowing it was poison, and it killed you, you would be just as dead, wouldn't you? I think you would be much easier in your mind and less liable to gossip injury, if you quietly got rid of this friend. You'd be safer with an average young man, seeing that you are a sensible girl.

Three Roases, Mathis, Texas.—I think you would be quite as safe in marrying a soldier whose past you did not know, as you would be in marrying any other kind of a man you knew as little about. You should not marry any man whose past and present you did not know as fully as is necessary. (2) It is not proper to speak to a young man you do not know, even if he does speak to you first. Anyway, it is the lady's place to speak first, and no lady will speak to a man she does not know unless she is compelled to by circumstances. (3) What are "Roases?"

Dakota Girls, Baldwin, N. Dak.—Listen, girls, if these young men who you say are so fine and so active in all kinds of religious work, but never take the girls to church or anywhere, are really consistent in their belief, you should tell them that works of necessity and mercy must be done or there isn't any real religion in them. Then you may tell them that as you can't find any other young men, it is a work of necessity for them to take you and it would be a mercy to you all if they did. If that doesn't bring them to a realizing sense of their Christian duty, you might as well give them up and accept the attentions of the sinners of neighboring communities. That is the only remedy I can think of just now. Begin by showing them this answer to your inquiry if you are not afraid to.

Water Lily, Lake Shore, Minn.—Don't you think, my dear, that you should mind your mother without question about the beaus, instead of asking me whether she is right or not? Not one mother in a hundred thousand will knowingly give her daughter bad advice.

Gray Eyes, Kosciusko, Miss.—Let him cry his eyes out when he comes around begging you not to break the engagement when he has given you every cause to and is just as careless after you forgive as he was before. He isn't any good and you won't be any better than he is if you remain engaged to him. There, that's what I think about his kind of engaged young men, and you may do as you please.

Anxious One, Lysite, Wyo.—Yes, dear, it was right for you to stop speaking to Fifteen-year-old for saying you let Fourteen-year-old love you and to give him back the precious pencil-slip he gave you and you owe him no apology nor nothing and when he teases you about Your Beloved you should break your slate over his face and tell him to go to thunder. I don't know where thunder is, but that's where people are very often told to go. My, my, isn't love something wonderful? But you do know how to spell, which is also wonderful!

S. S. O., Okaton, S. Dak.—As the young man failed to injure you as he tried to do and now is going with another girl and trying to prejudice her against you, it shows how mean and unworthy he is and you should neither speak to him, nor permit him to speak to you. A nice girl can't have too little to do with a man like he is. If the other girl is the right kind she will find him out soon, and will treat him as you did. (2) Only the very silly people stop speaking over trifling differences.

Trouble, Bethesda, Ky.—You are not the first girl whose sweetheart had a change of heart and fell in love with a younger sister. I suppose there is no cure for it, and all you can do is to console yourself with the thought, that at least he is still in the family. It is ever so much better to do that than to mope and be unhappy for what you cannot prevent.

Waiting, Torrington, Conn.—Eighteen is not young for a girl to begin to take notice of the young men, if she is through school, and the very first notice she should take is of the kind of young men who insist upon hugging and kissing. Stop that before it gets a start and if any young man says he will not go with you if you do not permit it, tell him frankly that you are not seeking the society of men of his ideas. No girl ever lost the respect of any man by respecting herself. Men, the right kind of men, I mean, want self-respecting women for wives and though, as a girl, you may not be popular with a certain class, you will, as a woman, hold the regard of those whose regard is worth holding. You have the proper ideas and you should not be persuaded to change them to meet any popular demand. Too many girls who start well, permit themselves to finish ill. Don't you do it!

Inquirer, New Salem, Pa.—If disinheritance by your parents will cause you greater loss than to lose the lifetime happiness you believe will be yours with this fine young man whom you have known from childhood, then save the inheritance and lose the happiness. Otherwise marry him and see how long it will be before your parents begin to show signs of wanting to be friends with their daughter in the comfortable home their son-in-law provides for her. You have my blessing.

Black Eyes, Coeburn, Va.—Break your engagement with him and wait until you are old enough to know what an engegement means before making another. And by all means don't make it with the present party. I should think you would be glad enough to break with a young man who paid you no attention in public. He must be ashamed of you.

The Daisy Trail, Minn.—Don't marry any one of three, or thirty, young men who want you, until you have head enough and heart enough to know which one you want, without having to ask somebody else to choose for you. (2) It is not absolutely necessary for the man to ask the girl's parents for her, if she is of age, as eloping couples usually omit that part, but it is the custom and should be observed. It is also the custom for the man to put the engagement ring on the girl's finger, we believe, but it isn't closely followed because it often happens that the ring is sent to her, in which event she must put it on herself. Her reply is not governed by custom and she may say anything she pleases. If she doesn't know what to say she shouldn't become engaged.

There, my dears, all your deserving questions are answered, except those sent to other departments and I feel real sure that all of you are perfectly satisfied with the answers. Now run along till next year and do everything you can to make the old year die happy. By, by till 1917.

his family must stop eating or live on charity. But it isn't so with the farmer and his family. Any farmer, that is a farmer at all, simply cannot go hungry. We have our cellar stocked with potatoes, sweet potatoes, turnips and apples, our lard and smoked meats, to say nothing of all our canned fruits, jellies, pickles and preserves, and remember all these things were raised on the farm. Then with our chickens, eggs and milk, does that sound like going hungry? No! Then the farmer and his family are the most independent people on earth, of panics and things of that sort. I don't mean to say farm life is easy. But nothing worth having is easy to obtain. It is hard work for the man and hard work for the woman, but farm men and women work together and consequently they get along better together. Did you ever stop to think of where most of the divorces come from? You seldom hear of a farmer getting a divorce. Why? Because the farmer and his wife work shoulder and shoulder together and that is what it takes to get along. Of course we farmers' wives don't have the back fence to gossip over every day, but farm life is so varied, having something new each day, that we do not miss it, and the cheap entertainments our town sisters pity us for having to do without. And the schools, unless one lives too far in the backwoods, will be found quite up to the standard.

I have a little boy, six years old, and I hope some day he will be a farmer like his father. This spring we gave him the little runt pig. When we sold it, with some others a short time ago, his father gave him his money and after looking at it a moment he exclaimed: "Say, I'm through with ten cent store junk, after this I'm going to take my dimes and buy stock." Why, even a little child can see things grow into money on the farm and 'tis money that talks these days.

And when I write of my boy I can't help but think of Mrs. Aldridge's little boy. I think, Mrs. A., your little son has lost confidence in you. Take him on your lap and talk to him. Overlook all his faults for a while, don't make mountains out of mole hills, praise him for all his good traits, no matter how small for there is nothing in the world a child likes better than praise, and I think before long you will see a difference in him. Never promise him anything unless you mean it and if at the last moment you find it impossible to do as you thought, tell him in a nice way and explain just why, same as you would to an older person. Win his confidence and he will be all right.

I would like to shake hands with Mrs. K. of W. Va. She expressed my sentiments exactly.

May I come again, or have I made my letter too long? I sincerely hope not but I feel as though I could write a column in answer to those who pity the poor farmers.

With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all, I am,
Very truly yours, MRS. CHRIS H. BAUER.

OSKALOOSA, IOWA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I will tell the sisters from Alva, Oklahoma, a few things I heard a doctor say about nerves and how to build them up. In the first place, don't worry and don't drink tea or coffee for it affects the nerves the same as alcohol and tobacco. Take plenty of exercise, drink water and more water. The common white bread possesses very little food value for nerves, so eat corn-meal bread or whole wheat bread. Eat fish, and cook potatoes with the skins on. Baked potatoes, eaten skins and all are nutritious. If possible have one hour of sleep out of doors each day for that one hour in the open air is equal to two in the house. Use fresh vegetables, right out of the garden, fresh eggs and if milk can be drank while warm it is more beneficial. Buttermilk or any kind of sour milk is good too. She said that little babies had broken down nerves from too much company at first.

I am a farmer's wife and have two boys age three and five years. Why is it they say "the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world." I, for one, don't believe it, for my boys, ever since they could sit up and take notice have tried to do what papa does, so a mother might try all her life and if the father isn't the man he ought to be, the boys are not likely to respond to her teachings unless she teaches them not to look up to their father, so I think more responsibility rests on fathers than on mothers in raising boys.

Wishing COMFORT success, MRS. C. L. RICE.

WHITETAIL, BOX 115, MONT.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

As so many of the sisters are writing in to express a few of their ideas, I thought I might as well try it also. I am a school teacher. I have taught for the last five years.

So many people ask me if teaching is not a tiresome and dreary work. I am glad to say I do not find it such. Children are such interesting "beings," so willing and always developing as they grow. What really is more interesting? If the teacher finds no pleasure and complains of it being a tiresome work, I am sure, it must be very dull for the children under her care. I am afraid many of the teachers do not realize that their ways and actions, also the manner in which they express themselves, has so much to do with the pupil.

Often the teacher, also the parents expect too much from the children. They do not realize that their minds are not as fully developed as their own. They do not seem to know that the children must be taught the difference between right and wrong until their own consciences are able to guide them right.

Don't you think fault finding is often a great mistake? It seems that is all some can find. The saying is, "Seek and you shall find." It must be that that is all they are seeking for, as that seems to be the only thing they can find. We all have good qualities also, and if we would look for them and find them, we would have something to profit by, anyway. It would help us to find much more pleasure and contentment for ourselves as well as for others. I often think of this little quotation:

"Dare we condemn the ills that others do?
Their strength is small, their trials not a few,
The tide of wrong is difficult to stem,
And if to us more clearly than to them
Is given knowledge of good and true,
More do they need our help and pity, too;
Dare we condemn?"

I think we should study our own actions more, for many of us don't know how we do act, and what

Faces As Fair As A Summer's Day

Are Possible If Stuart's Calcium Wafers Are Used for a Short Time After Each Meal.

Many people have been heard to say that they used creams and lotions for years without effect, yet after five or six days of Stuart's Calcium Wafers their complexions were perfectly clear.

"I Got Rid of Blackheads in a Jiffy by Using Stuart's Calcium Wafers."

They contain no poisonous drug of any kind, are perfectly harmless and can be taken with absolute freedom, and they work almost like magic. Calcium Sulphide, their principal ingredient, is the greatest blood-cleanser known to science.

No matter how bad your skin may be, Stuart's Calcium Wafers will quickly work wonders with it. It's goodby to blackheads, pimples, acne, boils, rash, eczema and a dirty "filled-up" complexion. You can get a box of Stuart's Calcium Wafers at any drug store at 50 cents a box, and you will be positively delighted with their wonderful effect.

And if you wish to try them first, send your name and address to F. A. Stuart Co., Box 342, Marshall, Mich. A free trial package will be mailed in a plain wrapper.

plan develops," she replied, "and send you instructions regarding the final act."

"All right, go ahead—I give you carte blanche for your expenses," said Monsieur Correlli, as he rose to leave the room.

Five hours later, he was fast asleep in a Pullman berth, and flying over the rails toward New York.

Meanwhile Edith, who was inclined to leave the house, and throw herself upon the kindness of Mrs. Stewart, found her mistress unusually gracious, seeking her aid in forwarding invitations for a reception, and in planning for what she called "a mid-winter frolic." She also incidentally announced, to the great gratification of Edith, that Monsieur Correlli had hurriedly departed for New York, with the intention of being absent a considerable time.

How You Can Get This Story In Book Form

If you do not care to wait for the monthly installments of this serial as they appear in COMFORT we will be glad to make you a present of the complete story in book form. You will enjoy reading this thrilling story of mingled romance and tragedy for it is one of the very best Mrs. Georgie Sheldon has written. The heroine is a refined and beautiful character that will challenge your wonder and admiration and stir the heart's strongest emotions. The story is full of action which moves rapidly through a succession of startling events to the final chapter. The "Masked Bridal" will run as a serial in COMFORT through the fall, winter and spring months, but you need not wait in order to get the complete story. Send us only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents, or your own subscription, renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 5 cents additional (30 cents in all) and we will send you a copy of the book free and postpaid.

Soft Warm Bed Blankets

Sent Prepaid For A Club Of Six

THIS IS an offer which no good housewife can afford to overlook. It is your opportunity to secure as many large comfortable bed blankets as you may need without a cent of expense. These fine double blankets are 72 inches long and 55 inches wide, extremely well made and finely finished. They are pure white in color and come with either blue or pink borders. Please notice that they are large enough for any standard size bed being of sufficient length to come up well on the pillow and wide enough so that they may be snugly tucked in at the sides. This is in reality one of the best bargains in a premium we have ever offered on account of the fact that we have bought a large quantity of these blankets direct from the mill at a special low price and therefore are enabled to offer them to our readers for a very small club of subscriptions. When you think of this big warm blanket on your bed or lying on a closet shelf ready for use when wanted, we believe that you will want to start a club at once for the sake of securing one or more of them free of all cost to you. We will gladly send you one or more of these splendid blankets upon the terms of the following Club Offer. For a club of only six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you one of these large, double bed blankets free by Parcel Post prepaid. You may have your choice of either blue or pink border. Prem. No. 4276. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

The Christmas of these poor souls will be a ghastly and not a merry one, unless you come to their aid with something more substantial than tracts and sympathy. Their names will not be listed again for a year, so pray be generous. Once more a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year and God bless you all.

Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a 15-month subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Drop Uncle Charlie's Poems in That Christmas Stocking and Make Everyone Happy

If you want a real old-fashioned Christmas, and want to forget European wars and hard times, get a copy of that wonderful volume, Uncle Charlie's Poems. Win This $635 Auto And Enough Cash To Run It A Whole Season!

THIS is the big, beautiful, powerful "Overland" which we are going to give away as First Grand Prize in COMFORT'S Subscription Contest. If you win this car—and your chances are as good as anybody's—you are also sure to win enough money in Monthly Cash Prizes to pay for running it an entire season—perhaps two seasons. If you really want an automobile here is your opportunity to own one without a cent of expense and win a good sum of money besides. Read every word of this announcement, then get busy with the subscription blank below.

108 Monthly Cash Prizes And 61 Grand Prizes Besides The Auto!

No money is required to enter this Contest and compete for the prizes. It is free to all! This splendid Overland Touring Car will actually be given free and freight prepaid to the man, woman, boy or girl who sends us the largest number of subscriptions to COMFORT up to and including April 30, 1917. Besides the Automobile there are also 61 Grand Cash Prizes and 108 Monthly Cash Prizes as follows:

First Grand Prize $635 Five-Passenger Overland Touring Car
Second Grand Prize $200 Cash
Third Grand Prize $150 Cash
Fourth Grand Prize $100 Cash
Fifth Grand Prize $75 Cash
Sixth Grand Prize $50 Cash
Seventh Grand Prize $25 Cash
Next Ten Grand Prizes, each $15 Cash
Next Fifteen Grand Prizes, each $10 Cash
Next Thirty Grand Prizes, each $5 Cash

NOVEMBER CASH PRIZES

First Prize	$30	Next 3 Prizes	$5 each
Second Prize	20	Next 4 Prizes	3 each
Third Prize	10	Next 8 Prizes	2 each

DECEMBER CASH PRIZES

First Prize	$30 or $60	Next 3 Prizes	$5 or $10 each
Second Prize	20 or 40	Next 4 Prizes	3 or 6 each
Third Prize	10 or 20	Next 8 Prizes	2 or 4 each

JANUARY CASH PRIZES

First Prize	$30 to $90	Next 3 Prizes	$5 to $15 each
Second Prize	20 to 60	Next 4 Prizes	3 to 9 each
Third Prize	10 to 30	Next 8 Prizes	2 to 6 each

The Cash Prizes for February, March and April are the same as those for January with the exception that the First Prize is $30 to $120 for February, $30 to $150 for March and $30 to $180 for April.

The Grand Prizes will be given in their order to the sixty-two Contestants who send in the most subscriptions up to and including April 30, 1917. The $635 Overland Car will go to the one who sends in the largest number of subscriptions. The $200 in Cash will go to the one who sends in the second largest number. The $150 in Cash will go to the one who sends in the third largest number, and so on.

The Monthly Cash Prizes will be paid to the contestants who send in the largest number of subscriptions each month—from November 1916 to April 1917, inclusive. And as the Grand Prizes are to be given to those who send in the largest total number of subscriptions for the entire six months you will readily see why those who win the most Monthly Cash Prizes will also win the Grand Prizes. And this also explains why the man, woman, boy or girl who wins the First Grand Prize of the Automobile will have plenty of money to run it because he or she will already have won a large number of the Monthly Cash Prizes.

You Get Your Premiums Anyway!

Remember this is a contest in which you simply cannot lose because we pay you for your work whether you win the prizes or not. Every club will entitle you to a fine premium which you may select from our regular Premium List or any issue of COMFORT. If you do not care for premiums you can have a cash commission. If you choose premiums they will be sent to you promptly upon receipt of every club sent in. If you prefer the cash commission you may deduct and retain 40% of all subscription money collected and remit the balance. In this way you are absolutely sure of being rewarded for your time and trouble, and of course we place the same clubs to your credit in the Contest, thereby giving you the chance to win one or more of the Monthly Cash Prizes as well as the Automobile or one of the other Grand Prizes.

Start Early And Be A Winner!

Don't wait and let others get ahead of you but hustle around for your first club and send it in as soon as possible using the special subscription blank printed at the right. Remember you have everything to gain and nothing to lose. You are sure of your premiums anyway—or your cash commission if you prefer—and even a small club will start a prize your way. Start a club today. Get all your friends and acquaintances and everybody you see to subscribe or renew their subscriptions to COMFORT. They will be glad to help you out. Just as soon as we hear from you we will mail you free and postpaid full information regarding the contest, rules and conditions, etc., and everything else you need to help you make a successful start. Mail us the special contest blank with your first club right away and let us enter your name in this Grand Contest for the $635 Overland Car and other Prizes.

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

M. E. S., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we think that if your husband died without a will and that if he left yourself and one child as his only heirs at law and next of kin you would be entitled as widow, to receive one half of his estate after payment of debts and expenses of administration. We think you have a legal right to sell or dispose of your share of the estate in any way you may choose.

C. DeL., Louisiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon your default in the payment of the money you borrowed from the bank you mention, the bank would have a legal right to enforce the payment of the loan with interest and costs against any property you might own not exempt by law from levy under execution; we think such payment could be enforced against the property you mention.

Maud S., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that where a deed to real estate runs to both husband and wife a tenancy by the entirety is created, so that the whole property upon the death of either becomes the sole property of the survivor, and does not go into the estate of the one dying first; upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, we think, in your state the widow would receive absolutely one half of the real estate and the whole of the personal property.

P. B. F., Maine.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the fees of the lawyer who kept your husband's will and attended to the probate of it for you, are not fixed by statute, but would be limited to a reasonable amount for the services performed; we think you as executrix can withdraw the moneys belonging to the estate now on deposit in the banks upon the presentation of a certificate showing your appointment as executrix and the other necessary papers; we think the legacy to the niece, who has died since the death of your husband, should be paid to her legal representative, who would be her executor, if she left a will, and her administrator, if she died without a will; we think you can file your final account as executrix at any time after the expiration of the time to file claim against the estate and after the collection of all the assets and the payment of all debts and legacies.

A. E., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property within the jurisdiction of the state, and any interest therein whether belonging to the inhabitants of the estate or not, and whether tangible or intangible, which shall pass by will or by the intestate law and of the state or any other state, or by deed, grant, sale or gift made or intended to take effect in possession or in enjoyment after the death of the grantor or donor, to any person in trust or otherwise, other than to or for the use of father, mother, husband, wife, lineal descendant, adopted child, the lineal descendant, adopted child, the lineal descendant of an adopted child of a decedent, or to or for charitable, educational, or religious societies or institutions within the state are subject to a tax of five per cent of its value above the sum of one thousand dollars, after the payment of all debts, for the use of the state; we think this tax is increased in some instances; this tax is commonly referred to as the inheritance tax. We think, in your state, upon the death of a widower, leaving no will, and leaving one child as his only heir at law and next of kin, the whole estate, after payment of debts and expenses of administration, would go to such child.

Mrs. W. S. S., Mississippi.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a conveyance of the homestead must be by the joint deed of the husband and wife if living together, else the conveyance is void as to two thousand dollars in value of the property conveyed; in other words we think the wife's signature is necessary to the conveyance of any part of the homestead, if living together, unless the part left is of a value of two thousand dollars.

Mrs. D. A., Ohio.—Under the laws of Kentucky, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child or descendant, his widow would receive dower of a one third interest for life in his real estate, the balance going to his parents, brothers, sisters, grandparents or other kindred depending upon who is left; if there is none such and no paternal or maternal kindred the whole of the property would go to the widow.

T. H., Colorado.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that the man you mention cannot be compelled to support the minor children of his deceased wife by a former marriage; we think he is legally liable for the burial expenses of his wife.

Miss P. I. N., New Hampshire.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that women become of age at twenty-one.

N. B., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and more than one child, or one child and the issue of a deceased child, his widow would receive one third of his estate, the balance going in equal shares to his children, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parent's share; we think that if there be children of two marriages they inherit equally.

D. G., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the woman you mention, who has an insane husband from whom she is not divorced, cannot legally remarry during the lifetime of such husband, and that any children born to a marriage contracted under such circumstances would be illegitimate.

H. H., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child or descendant and no parent, his widow would receive absolutely all of the personal property and one half of the real estate, the balance of the real estate going in equal shares to the brothers and sisters and their descendants. We do not think the child of the widow by a former marriage would receive any share in the estate.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

an impression we give those in our environment, through our actions.

I often read the discussions on Woman Suffrage. I suppose we all have formed opinions either for or against this great question. I think if a woman had the right to vote she would take more interest in politics. It would bring the study of "what is going on in the world," into the homes. There are many points in favor of this question, but I cannot take the time to go into detail now.

In regard to Mrs. E. D. Hanna's statement of living in the city. She thinks the city has so many better qualities than the country. I cannot wholly agree with her. The child in the country cultivates a purer mind, as a rule. It learns more through its own experience. It is brought in closer touch with nature. Many children, in the city are compelled to work, when they should be going to school, whereas, if they were living on the farm, they could arrange things so that they could go to school and do the work also. On the whole the children in the country are more able to confront the tasks that will come their way as they go out into the world, I think.

I hope the Sisters' Corner will draw many new members into its interesting circle during the coming winter, when there will be more time for such work.

Besides being a teacher, I am also a claim-holder. My claim is quite rough, but it is very good for pasture. It is two and a half miles from town. This country is very good for cattle, as there is considerable rough land suitable for pasture and grazing. When the winters are not too severe the cattle run about at large and feed upon the grass. The grass cures itself, so it is almost as nutritious as when it is green.

I will close by describing myself. I weigh about one hundred and forty-five pounds. I am five feet six inches tall. Have blue eyes and medium brown hair.

One more interesting subject, which has just entered my mind and that is the need of a "social center" in the country and small town. The young folks are at a loss as to what to do for amusement and to extend their education to practical things such as sewing, cooking, agriculture, simple manual training, how they can make money on the farm, how to give social affairs, etc. I think a one- or two-year course in such work would be far better than all the high school they can cram into their heads.

When the eighth grade pupils get their diplomas, they are able to fight most any battle, give the life of any great man, or recite endless poems, but they have not even a vague idea of how to sew, drive a nail, mend a broken chair or pail, plant a seed, or dress themselves in a becoming manner.

Love to Mrs. Wilkinson and all sisters,
Sincerely, ELIZABETH DIRKS.

Miss Dirks. If anyone knows of a "social center" comprising all, or part, of the advantages you suggest, perhaps they will give the rest of us the benefit of their knowledge. We'd all like to hear, I'm sure.—Ed.

The Land of Beginning Again

I wish there were some wonderful place
Called the Land of Beginning Again,
Where all our mistakes and all our heartaches
And all our poor selfish griefs
Could be dropped, like a shabby old coat, at the door
And never put on again.

I wish we could come on it all unaware,
Like the hunter who finds a lost trail;
And I wish that the one whom our blindness had done
The greatest injustice of all
Could be at the gate like the old friend that waits
For the comrade he's gladdest to hail.

We would find the things we intended to do
But forgot and remembered too late—
Little praises unspoken, little promises broken,
And all of the thousand and one
Little duties neglected that might have perfected
The days of one less fortunate.

It wouldn't be possible not to be kind
In the Land of Beginning Again;
And the ones we misjudged and the ones whom we grudged
Their moments of victory here,
Would find the grasp of our loving handclasp
Moré than penitent lips could explain.

For what had been hardest we'd know had been best
And what had seemed loss would be gain,
For there isn't a sting that will not take wing
When we've faced it and laughed it away;
And I think that the laughter is most what we're after,
In the Land of Beginning Again.

So I wish that there were some wonderful place,
Called the Land of Beginning Again,
Where all our mistakes and all our heartaches
And all our poor selfish griefs
Could be dropped, like a ragged old coat, at the door
And never put on again.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around Home.

To remove tar from silk, rub with lard and then wash in warm soapsuds.

When pressing woolen goods spread a newspaper over the material instead of a cloth and there will be no lint to brush off.

Place a dish containing quicklime in a damp closet or cupboard. This not only absorbs the dampness but acts as a disinfectant.

Add a teaspoon of beef extract to a meat pie and enjoy the delicious flavor, even if made from pieces of almost tasteless meat.

Save egg shells for cleaning bottles. Crush and put into bottle with cold water and shake thoroughly. Repeat process if necessary, rinsing well.

MRS. H. L. W., So. Dakota.

When putting muslin curtains on a brass or wooden rod, cover the end of the rod with the finger of an old glove. This saves time and also prevents tearing the curtain.

Black silk can be made to look almost as good as new by sponging on the right side with weak tea or coffee and pressing on the right side with a thick flannel between the silk and the iron.

TO CUT HOT BREAD.—To cut brown bread when hot use a piece of common twine, instead of a knife. Cross the twine, after it is put around the loaf the width of the slice, and draw the ends, and the brown bread will be cut smooth and even. Heat the knife to cut fresh white bread smoothly.

Remedies

CUTS, OR SORES.—Bathe inflamed parts with salt and water, one tablespoon of salt to one and one half cups of warm water. Dust with a good talcum powder.

INDIGESTION.—Burn willow to a charcoal and beat to a powder. To a pint of this add two tablespoons of salt and one half teaspoon of sulphur. Mix well and take a teaspoonful after each meal. This will keep food from souring and aids digestion too, or at least, it is the only medicine I have taken for two years. MRS. ADLEL LOVELACE, Troy, S. C.

TOOTHACHE.—If the tooth is hollow, fill the cavity with a piece of tar. This generally relieves the ache in a few minutes. N. C., Oregon.

PNEUMONIA.—Equal parts rye meal and chopped onions and enough apple vinegar to make a poultice. Cook five minutes, stirring all the while. Fill a flannel bag, large enough to cover chest, and apply as hot as can be stood. Repeat till patient perspires.

EMMA PLIESEIS, Pocahontas, Mo.

Make The Children Happy With A Set Of These New Dressing Dolls!

Bobby in his Boy Scout Suit | Beatrice in her Holiday Dress | Betty in her Party Dress | Bobby in his Sunday Best | Beatrice in her Winter Dress | Betty in her Play Dress | Betty in her Visiting Dress | Beatrice in her School Dress | Bobby in his Sailor Suit

The Little Folks Love To Play With These Large, Handsome Life-Like Dolls Which May Be Dressed In So Many Different Beautiful Costumes. Over A Foot Tall, Printed In Gorgeous Colors, Ready To Be Dressed When You Receive Them.

Three Dolls With Nine Dresses And Nine Hats Given To You!

YES—this is the most delightful family of dolls that any little girl or boy ever had to play with. The children enjoy them because they are something entirely new and different from all other dolls. Even the most expensive imported dressed dolls do not begin to furnish the little ones with the amusement and joy to be derived from these dear little boy and girl dressing dolls with their bright happy faces and so many different changes of suits, dresses and hats. In the large cities where all the newest ideas are first put on the sale these large handsomely attired life-like dolls are going into all the rich homes where there are little ones and they are fast taking the place of the more costly and elaborate dolls and other toys, because the children never tire of them. These dolls are of course not the small so-called "cut out" paper dolls but are actually 14 inches in height, printed in the most beautiful life-like colors on thick heavy cardboard and so made that they will stand upright in almost any position you wish to place them. But the best part of all is that you can dress and undress them as often as you wish. We not only give you the dolls but all the extra different, beautiful suits, dresses and hats that go with them. Each doll has three different suits or dresses and three different hats and there are three dolls and nine different dresses and hats in all.

Brother Bobby the little boy doll has a handsome Kakhi "Boy Scout" suit with shoes, leggings, coat, hat, haversack and staff complete; a real sure-enough white sailor suit including boatswain's whistle, and a real swell Sunday-go-to-meeting suit, consisting of a black and white check top coat, nobby hat, tan gloves, stockings and white top shoes.

Sister Beatrice is a handsome little girl with golden curls and has a most sumptuous wardrobe consisting of a pretty checked holiday dress, a saucy little hat with feather, white socks and slippers, a school dress with striped Tam-o'shanta, school bag and lunch box and a very expensive winter costume including a handsome set of furs, muff, fur-trimmed hat, leggings and gloves.

Cousin Betty is exactly as pretty as Beatrice only she is a handsome brunette whereas Beatrice is a blonde. Betty is not to be outdone in the matter of clothes either. She is always ready for a romp with a sensible play dress cut in the latest style with hat to match and carrying a large dressed doll in her arms. Then she has a visiting dress with hat, etc., as shown in illustration and a perfect dream of a party dress. And of course when undressed each of these little girl dolls has her own dainty lace and ribbon trimmed underwear while Bobby is every inch a boy in his cool "B. V. D's"

These Dolls Will Cost You No Money!

We will send you all three dolls with nine dresses and nine hats or if you prefer one doll with three dresses and three hats free and prepaid in return for a small favor. Send us only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or one three-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents and we will send you all three dolls with their nine dresses and nine hats by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7842.

Or, for your own renewal for two years at thirty cents and twenty cents extra (50 cents in all), we will send you all three dolls with nine dresses and nine hats by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7842.

Or, we will send you one doll with three dresses and three hats for one one-year subscription (not your own) at 25 cents, or for your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all). Premium No. 7911. It will not be necessary for you to write a letter—just fill out the coupon printed at the right and return it to us with the subscriptions and money. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Barking Dog

Premium No. 7422

For A Club Of Two!

YOU simply press down gently on top of "doggie's" head and he opens his mouth and barks right out loud. And not only does he bark like a real dog but he looks like one. With his alert sparkling eyes, "bat" ears, and snubby upturned nose he is the perfect likeness of a cute little bull terrier pup. He is pure white with brown spots, and sitting on his haunches as you see him in the picture he measures over six inches high. His body, head and legs are made of practically indestructible material covered with soft thick felt; the marvelous mechanism in the throat that produces the bark is so constructed that it will not easily get out of order.

These wonderful barking dogs come from Japan where they make some of the finest mechanical toys in the world. In spite of the war we managed to import a limited quantity of them and while they last we are going to send them free to COMFORT homes where there are little boys and girls. Doggie looks so lifelike and his sharp yelping bark sounds so natural we know he will surely delight the children more than anything else you could possibly get for them. We will send you this fine barking dog exactly as illustrated and described free upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer: For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or one three-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents we will send you this cute novelty, Barking Dog free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7422.

Children's Happy Hour

Matilda's Happy Christmas

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

DEAR children, do you know what makes everyone so happy at Christmas-time? It is love. The presents you get are nothing unless love is mixed with the giving. When you make a gift to a friend, be sure and make it tell the story of your love for him. I knew a little girl once who thought all the pleasure of the Christmas season came from the toys and dolls she got. She longed to have more and more and made up her mind that she would spend nearly all of her money on herself and besides that ask Santa Claus for playthings enough to fill a whole room. Her uncles and aunts and grandparents and papa and mamma gave her plenty of money but she spent it all on herself and when Christmas morning came she had so many presents she didn't know which one to look at first. Her stocking was full, and the table was piled high and there were things on the floor. Not one had forgotten her but she had forgotten everybody. For the first few hours she was so busy and excited she did not know just how she felt but something seemed to be gnawing at her heart and accusing her and telling her she had down wrong. Try as she might, she could not make the feeling go away. She took the things off her Christmas tree and put them back again and dressed herself in her two new suits, the plaid one with the coat and leggings and the black velvet one with the Tam-o-shanter cap, but this did not seem to please her. In desperation she put on her new pink silk pajamas, but even that did no good. To tell the truth there was unhappiness in her heart and it was growing bigger every minute. Even when the neighbors came in and praised her things and patted her on the head she felt no joy. Late in the forenoon her grandma came with more gifts and of course they showed her everything Matilda had received. When they had handled the whole pile, Matilda's mamma said:

"I guess everyone in the world gave my little girl something."

"And what did she give?" asked grandma, staring over her spectacles at the child.

Matilda tried to answer but could not. A lump came in her throat and two hot tears burned in her eyes. Finally she sputtered out:

"I didn't give a thing and I'm dreadfully unhappy," and then she burst out crying and could not be comforted for quite a long while.

"We must find some way to make her happy," whispered her kind and worried mother.

"Let her come with me," offered grandma, "I will manage it." To not a soul but Matilda did she tell her plan but the child seemed greatly pleased. More than half of her playthings were loaded on the automobile and away they went to a poor family over the hill. Six children were there and they had no toys at all. One by one Matilda doled out her pretty new things and when she saw the happy smiles on the faces of the ragged children her own heart grew warm and she knew she had discovered a great secret. It was this. To make yourself happy, you must make others happy. There was one little girl about her own size there and Matilda whispered to grandma that she would like to give her the new velvet coat and cap.

"You may," smiled the kind old lady and they had to drive home again for it. It did not take long and when Matilda had put it on her new friend she just could not help from crying a little, but this time it was from happiness. When they got back it was just time for dinner and when grandma told the story of their adventure everybody looked proudly at Matilda and this time she did not have to turn away in shame.

Cut-Out Doll Directions

Paste the entire picture on a piece of cardboard (using boiled flour paste) and smooth, with the hands, from the center towards the edges. Put it in a large book to dry and let it remain there at least three hours. Cut out each dress and hat with scissors and color them with crayons, chalk or water colors. To put the hats on, slit them on the dotted lines and press down over the head. The dresses are held on by bending the little flaps back around the body. To make the doll and Christmas tree stand alone bend the base strips back near the ends to form corners or angles. Keep the set in an envelope and when your mamma reads the story you can arrange the dolly girl and the other figures to suit yourself.

Stocking Full of Christmas Presents

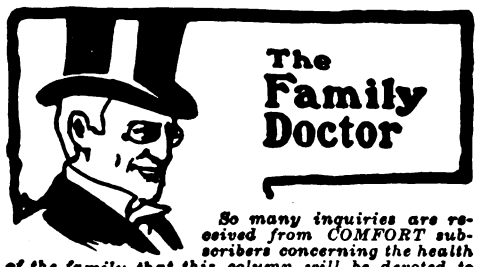
Free To Every Little Girl!

Golden Locks And Her Lovely Twin Babies!

All Three Dollies Given To You Without Cost!



Premium No. 4631.

Mothers, Don't Fail To Read This Offer!

COMFORT wants to give free to your little girl and every little girl this handsome doll Family stamped in beautiful colors on strong cloth with full directions so that you can cut them out, stuff and sew them up in less than ten minutes. "Golden Locks" is almost as big as a real baby, for she stands one and one half feet high and her cute little twin babies which you see in the picture stand over half a foot high. These dolls cannot be broken no matter how much they are thrown around or dropped on the floor and you can make them bend their arms and legs, stand up and sit down in a chair and assume all sorts of natural positions. They have beautiful golden hair which hangs in the dearest curls you ever saw and fastened with a bright red ribbon bow that cannot get lost or become untied, handsome red cheeks, rosy lips and lovely blue eyes which smile at you in such a lifelike way that you would almost think they were ready to speak and say "Mama." As shown in above illustration they are dressed in dainty lace-trimmed underwear with bright red stockings and black buttoned boots. The three dolls together—"Golden Locks" and the two sweet Baby Dolls—make the cutest and prettiest Doll Family any little girl ever had to play with. They are lots better for the little folks than the more expensive bisque and china dolls because they will not break or snarl their pretty hair or lose their eyes. There is no little girl who will not instantly fall in love with this beautiful Doll Family and spend many happy hours with it, so we hope that every mother who reads this offer will take advantage of it at once. We will send you all three dolls free by Parcel Post prepaid on the terms of the following special offers.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Mrs. K., Wetaskiwin, Alta.—What you need more than anything else is rest and the advice, not the medicine, of a competent and kindly physician. There is nothing radically wrong with you, but your nerves are out of order and your general system is so run down that scarcely an organ is working as it should. Any treatment by us would be impossible because it will be absolutely necessary for proper treatment for a physician to see you and after examination tell you what should be done for each individual disarrangement. If you could go to a hospital for a month where you could rest, have proper food and be looked after by intelligent nurses and physicians we believe you would be put fairly on the road to normal health. Two things you possess which are invaluable in recovering health and those are good sense and a cheerful spirit. We are sorry we cannot make you as well in body as you are in head and heart. Our sincerest sympathy goes out to the thousands and thousands of overworked women who need only rest to be well.

Mrs. J. V., Union Point, Ga.—Looseness of the bowels of long continuance as an after effect of measles is neither chronic diarrhea nor chronic disentery and just what it is can only be determined by examination by a physician, and frequently not then. It can only be properly treated by such a physician, though the patient may be of great assistance by keeping a careful watch on the diet, taking principally liquid food, milk, eggs, rice, a little rare meat and stale bread. The object being to eat only the most digestible food in order to give the stomach as little work as possible. Milk punches are often of value, as the alcoholic stimulant is beneficial to the stomach and intestines. The taking of strong astringents should not be done except by the advice of a physician. Stomach troubles of this sort are very stubborn, often incurable, and require all the care of the patient as well as the attention of the physician, though his constant attention is not needed. Suppose as a home treatment you try two milk punches a day, morning and evening, containing about a tablespoonful of good whiskey, each, and take a one grain camphor pill, three times a day for a week and see what effect they will have.

L. S., Lexington, Mo.—We are glad to learn that you are sufficiently interested in your bodily welfare to want to know where you may procure books on anatomy, physiology and hyglene and for your benefit and that of other COMFORT readers who ought to know about themselves we will say that for ordinary use the text books of the schools are the best to begin with and any teacher in your community will tell you what books they use and where you may get them. If you are still interested after reading them carefully and want to know more, any physician in your neighborhood will tell you what are the most popular books on the subject for general reading. In the school books, usually all three subjects are to be found in the same volume and the price is reasonable. You cannot read anything of more vital value to you and we hope COMFORT readers generally will read up on the subject.

Old Subscriber, Port Orford, Oregon.—The large lumps you mention as appearing at cetain times on various parts of your husband's head and body are not due to any catarrh or eczema we know of in this part of the country, and they can only be properly treated by a physician who can examine them and determine their cause. Climate usually does not have much effect on eczema, but we cannot imagine a much worse climate than yours for catarrh, with its rain all winter and heavy fogs most of the other months. Your husband should get out of it and live in a climate which is dry, either hot or cold, but dry. For the eczema, which is a stubborn customer, we recommend that he rub his skin night and morning with cocoa-butter, to be had at any drug-store for about seventy-five or eighty cents a pound, and usually put up in half pound packages. The butter is a fine skin food and is good to use for any itching trouble and is good for a healthy skin.

Mrs. G. N., Palmer, Nebr.—Nothing serious will happen, we fancy, unless done to excess, but you should not feel any hesitancy in going to your family doctor for your most intimate troubles. Modesty is lovely in woman, but when it is of the false kind which may result in disaster to health and perhaps to life, then it is worse than the most vicious immodesty. Never let modesty interfere with plain common sense.

Mrs. J. H., Vancouver, Wash.—Very many women suffer from piles and because of a false modesty do not attend to the trouble as it should be. In all drug-stores ointments, solutions and salves may be had which are quite as effective as any that a physician may prescribe, but something more than mere external application is necessary, as piles may result from indigestion, constipation and other stomach troubles requiring treatment and they become so severe at times that an operation is necessary. On this account a physician should be consulted and his advice had as to what to do both to prevent and to cure. As piles are various in kind and degree there can be no general rule of treatment laid down, each patient requiring special advice.

D. K., Elgin, Texas.—Pyorrhea, or Rigg's disease, which at one time was beyond control of dentists, no longer is, and any good dentist should be able to cure any case of it that can be cured. But there is no home remedy for it any more than there is a home remedy for filling a tooth. You must go to a dentist who knows how to treat it. Ask your dentist what dentrifice to use, as some are made especially for pyorrhea. The drug emetine injected into the gums is a sure cure for this disease, but it must be administered by a skilled physician or dentist.

C. H., Pontiac, Mich.—You are like a good many other COMFORT patients who imagine that a doctor a thousand miles away can guess nearer to what is wrong with them and then guess at a treatment to go with his first guess and get better results in their cases than their own home physicians, but they are mistaken. We are sorry we cannot make a well man of you, but we cannot and the best advice we can give is that you keep on trying the doctors who can examine you and at least not guess at the proper treatment. Did you ever try osteopathic treatment? You are young enough to have hope in plenty.

E. B., New York, N. Y.—The statement is just as ridiculous as it sounded to you because everybody doesn't have to have measles some time before he dies. Most people have it in childhood, some adults have it, some old people die with it, but a great many people escape entirely, just as you have done so far and will continue to do if you are careful to keep away from contagion.

Mrs. M. O. G., Round Top, Texas.—Massaging the calves is about as good treatment as can be administered for cramps. Hot applications are also beneficial. But thorough massaging will start the circulation better than anything else. (2) The surgeon who recommended the operation can tell you much more definitely than we can. Ask him.

G. H., Dubois, Wyo.—It is not at all uncommon for men to have a very heavy growth of hair all over their bodies and usually the hairy men have very good health, as you do. It is natural and while it may be removed, it will grow again and the better way is not to interfere with nature and be glad she made you hairy all over rather than bald all over.

No. 5, Grundy Center, Iowa.—When you don't know anything about a medicine except its name and are not very sure of that, it is a very wise thing for you not to be asking what it is good for, how to administer it, where it can be bought and other questions showing you wish to try it on yourself. Why don't you try it on the cat so that if it results seriously, it will be the cat and not you who must suffer from ignorance? Don't try to doctor yourself unless you are absolutely sure you know just what the matter is and what shouldn't be done for it.

The Uncle Charlie Birthday Fund

UNCLE CHARLIE in his report just to hand states that from October 1st to November 1st, 120 of our readers by subscriptions and donations increased the fund being raised for his benefit by $116, making the grand total $336 contributed by 320 members of the COMFORT family up to November first.

Uncle Charlie, needless to say, is deeply grateful to all those who have so generously given their time and means to make this inspiring project a success. All gifts have been personally acknowledged by him. What has been done so far is small, but it is only a beginning. Thus far only one in 5,000 of our vast army of subscribers have been heard from and there must be thousands, nay tens of thousands anxious to make this a testimonial of practical importance.

For twenty years Uncle Charlie has battled with fate, asking odds of no one, and he is asking nothing now. The movement started with our readers and it is up to them to make it a success, as he refuses to be put in the position of seeking reward for rendering a public service that he deemed to be his duty.

But sympathy and compliments do not buy bread, or bricks, or provide for sickness and old age. It requires but little if any drain on either our time or resources to forever place Uncle Charlie beyond the reach of want or worry, and now, if ever, is the time to do it.

Christmas is with us and Christmas is the magic key that unlocks every heart and every pocket. Everyone knows of Whitcomb Riley the beloved poet. Uncle Charlie is our Whitcomb Riley and in his book of poems will be found dozens of pieces just as humorous and delightful in their way as "Little Orphant Annie" and the "Raggedy Man." Only one COMFORT home in thirty-five has a copy of this delightful and beautiful work, which should be in the hands of every child and grown up in the land, for it appeals to both young and old with irresistible force. Uncle Charlie's Story Book too is a mine of wealth. Read "How Uncle Charlie Became A Hero of The Spanish War" and "How Maria and Billy the Goat" first made his acquaintance, and you will rock with laughter and your eyes will fill with tears and life will be made sweeter for you all.

Play over and sing the delightful melodies in his wonderful song book, and pay a visit to his home by securing his beautiful picture book, the home which it is in your power to make actually his, by a little effort on your part. At least a hundred thousand of you should secure these books. Those who already have them, know scores who need them and can pass them along as gifts.

Christmas only comes once a year. If the Uncle Charlie Fund is to be made a success worthy of COMFORT and its readers, we must all get together and pull together with a will. The time is short. Let every day count. Don't leave it to the other fellow but do a double share in case the other fellow does not do anything at all. A few can accomplish little but millions can accomplish miracles, and there is no more inspiring and beautiful work than this.

Here is how you can help.

1. By cash donations.

2. By purchasing Uncle Charlie's books (see advertisement.)

3. Those who cannot spare the money for a cash donation or for purchase of his books can contribute by getting subscriptions to COMFORT in aid of the "Uncle Charlie Benefit Fund" and instead of taking the club premium or cash commission themselves direct that it be credited to the fund. In such cases I will pay over to Uncle Charlie one half of the subscription price of all subscriptions sent for this purpose. The regular cash commission on COMFORT subscriptions is 40 per cent, but for Uncle Charlie's Benefit Fund I will allow 50 per cent. Another way to help him and benefit yourself is to get up a subscription club and take one of his books as your premium.

In one or other of these ways every COMFORT reader who wishes to do so can help swell the fund for Uncle Charlie which has my hearty approval and will have my assistance within the limits of propriety.

Religion, Rum and so Forth

"Two hundred and sixty-two million dollars is a good deal of money," said a man who did not have that much saved for a rainy day, "and it is more when that amount is spent every year for one thing, yet the people of this country spend that much annually on their religious organizations,—home churches and foreign missions.—250 millions of it being spent at home. Three quarters of a million dollars a day, thirty thousand an hour, five thousand dollars a minute! Some money, that, isn't it? Seems like enough to convert the whole world, doesn't it? And it might, if we didn't spend so much to offset it. There's liquor, for example, all kinds of hard drinks. Do we spend five thousand dollars a minute on that bad habit? Do we? Well, we spend nearly ten times five thousand a minute. Our liquor bills for one year amount to two billion, two hundred million dollars. Very close to ten times more spent for rum than for religion! That doesn't sound much like converting our own country from the error of its ways, much less the whole world, does it? Then there's tobacco. Not a bit of use for anybody to have that habit, but we have it just the same, and we spend one billion two hundred millions a year on it. Nearly five times as much as for our religion, and tobacco never yet helped anybody to a better life, nor saved a soul from sin! For jewelry and silver-ware, which most of us plain people don't have any surplus of, eight hundred millions a year are spent by those who have the money. For automobiles which some of us are able to get by mortgaging our farms, or something like that, five hundred millions are spent. Twice as much as for religion, though this is offset some by the fact that a good many people these days ride to church on Sundays in their cars. For candy, which isn't necessary at all, we spend two hundred millions a year and for tea and coffee half that amount, or say, a dollar each for our population of one hundred millions. Lots of us don't drink soda-water or other soft drinks, at least, not very often, unless we count the red lemonade when the circus comes around, yet somebody spends one hundred and twenty million dollars a year for it, and to make matters worse, they spend thirteen millions a year for chewing-gum. Think of chewing up that much money every year!! For patent medicines we spend eighty millions a year,—everybody has aches and pains—and for millinery, the women, or their husbands for them, spend ninety millions and this seems to me, next to religion, to be the most reasonable expenditure. Allowing that one third of our population is women of an age to wear millinery, the ninety millions represent an expense of only about three dollars per person, and certainly the woman who can get along with only three dollars' worth of hats and trimmings a year could not be called extravagant by anybody except a prevaricator of the most malicious mind. Maybe some day we will learn to spend our money for better things, but just now, it looks like too much of it was being worse than thrown away, doesn't it?"

What Shall I Give Them For Christmas?

HOW MANY TIMES do you ask yourself this question as the holidays draw near and you are making up your list of those whom you wish to remember with some appropriate yet inexpensive Xmas gift?

Oftentimes you find it almost impossible to decide—it even becomes a source of downright worry because all of us like to feel that the presents we give are something that will be actually needed and appreciated by the recipients.

Why not let us help you solve at least one of your Christmas problems this year? We believe we know of one present that will bring more pleasant and more frequent reminders to your friends than almost anything else you could buy—and that is

A One Year's Subscription To Comfort

Here is the one gift that pleases everybody—a gift that will become a cheery, welcome reminder of you month after month for an entire year—and at so little expense you will not notice it at all. Simply send us 25 cents and the name and address of the friend you wish to remember written on the coupon below and we will enter the subscription for one full year to commence with our Christmas number and with it we will also mail

A Beautiful Christmas Presentation Card

so that both paper and card will reach the recipient at about the same time. The card is beautifully colored and embossed with a dainty appropriate Christmas design and verse on one side and on the other side is a specially printed announcement of the gift and a space left for your name as the giver which we will fill in ourselves before the card is mailed.

Isn't this a splendid idea? Surely among your friends there is someone who will appreciate and enjoy such an interesting magazine as COMFORT and who will think of you gratefully every time the carrier leaves it at the door.

Better send us your friend's name and the money now—it's none too early to avoid the Christmas rush—and you will have at least one present less to think about because we will attend to all the details. After you mail the coupon and money you can dismiss the matter from your mind as we will take good care of your order and mail both the paper and the handsome Christmas Card properly filled out with your name as the giver at precisely the right time.

6 Wheel Chairs in November

375 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

Six wheel chairs in November is a gain of two over October and makes a total of 65 that I have sent out thus far this year. It is much the best showing we ever made; it is splendid, but we ought to do even better and we can if we try. So all please boost with a will to make December a big month for the shut-ins and close the year's record of the Wheel-Chair Club in a blaze of glory.

The six November wheel chairs go to the following applicants. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Miss Etta Hendrixson, R. 3, Kaufman, Texas, 226; Henry C. Williams, 3610 Ave. F, East Lake, Tenn., 200; Mrs. Martha E. Harvey, Fallon, Nevada, 140; Mrs. Della Wyman, Jamestown, N. Dak., 126; Raymon Boswell, Forsyth, Mo., 110; Mrs. Edith M. Cole, Bryant Pond, Maine, 97.

Etta Hendrixson, age 15, has been in bed since May, 1915, suffering from tuberculosis of the right thigh bone. Four of her good friends sent 226 subscriptions, all in one day, saying that 200 of them were for her chair and the extra 26 were to help some other needy shut-in to obtain a wheel chair. Certainly they have the right stripe of Christian charity and it shows up in their work. You will see their names in this month's Roll of Honor below.

Henry C. Williams, age 14, is severely afflicted with rheumatism from the effect of which he has been a crippled shut-in the last fifteen months. Mrs. Williams sent the entire 200 subscriptions for the boy's chair all in one bunch as she had obtained them so quickly with the help of friends.

Mrs. Martha E. Harvey, age 64, is so badly crippled by rheumatism that she can not walk, yet this brave sufferer does all her housework sitting in a chair, made by her son, in which she manages to push herself over the floor. She is a widow dependent on her son, himself a cripple, who earns a living by selling popcorn. Her wheel chair will be a much needed help.

Mrs. Della Wyman, age 40, crippled the last six years by paralysis. For some time she was under treatment at the State Hospital in Jamestown, N. Dak., but Mrs. G. L. Acheson of Dale, N. Dak., who obtained all the subscriptions for her chair, writes, that Mrs. Wyman is about to leave the institution. She says Mrs. Wyman is in great need of a wheel chair.

Raymond Boswell, age 15, has been a helpless cripple all his life and can not even use his hands. The wheel chair will be a pleasure to him and a great help to his mother in taking care of him.

Mrs. Edith M. Cole, age 30, has five children ranging from three to twelve years of age. Although her legs are so drawn up by rheumatism that she can not take a step she does all the cooking for the family and sends her children to school. What a pity for such a good mother to be so afflicted! The wheel chair will help lighten her toil.

We have an interesting Roll of Honor this month, and I hope more of you will get your names there next month so to help me send a ray of joy into the sad lives of a goodly number of poor crippled shut-ins by presenting them with a wheel chair on Christmas.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours. Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

COMFORT Wheel Chair Enables Him to Get a Peep at the Outside World

ARTHUR, ILL.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I wish to express my heartfelt thanks to you and COMFORT friends who so liberally helped me to obtain my wheel chair which enables me to escape from the confinement of my room and get a peep at the outside world which looks very beautiful to me after having been a shut-in for twenty-three long years. God bless you and all who helped me.

Yours respectfully, JOHN W. HANKINS.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

Mrs. T. A. Williams, Tenn., for Henry Clinton Williams, 200; Nellie Odell, Texas, for Emmett Odell, 150; Mrs. Rosetta Smith, Nevada, for Martha E. Harvey, 68; H. C. Anderson, Texas, for Miss Etta Hendrixson and Needy Shut-in, 58; Mrs. H. C. Comfort's Comicalities "Jest for Fun"

In Time of Need

"Help the blind!" muttered the beggar on the corner, near a picture theater.

"Here, poor man," said a young woman, "here is some money."

She dropped the dime on the pavement and the "blind man" leaned forward to pick it up.

"I thought you were blind!" exclaimed the girl.

"No, lady; I'm only taking the regular man's place for a while."

"Is he sick?"

"No, lady. He wanted to go in and see the moving picture show!"

Just His Luck

It happened during one of the air raids, at a place not specified in the newspaper reports.

Isaacstein, just emerging from a chemist's shop, got in the way of the explosion, and when he recovered in the hospital found that both his feet had been amputated.

"Just my luck," he grumbled, and I had just vent and bought sixpenny-vorth of corn-plaster."—Tid-Bits.

Fair Exchange

Dora—"And so you quarreled?"

Lallie—"Yes, and I returned all his presents, and what do you think he did?"

Dora—Something horrid, I'm sure.

Lallie—He sent me half a dozen boxes of face powder with a note explaining that he thought he had taken as much as that home on his coat since he first met me."

The Connoisseurs

Two farmers, attired in corduroys and gaiters, were strolling through a picture gallery, where they looked, and apparently felt, decidedly out of place. But at last they brought up before a picture which really seemed to please them—a portrait of a lovely girl with a particularly ugly bulldog.

"This is something nice, Dick," said one.

"What is it called?"

Dick referred to the catalogue.

"Beauty and the Beast," he said.

The other man looked closer at the bulldog.

"Ah!" he sighed, appreciatively, "he is a beauty, too!"

When the Ranch Sailed

The following story is told about Col. D. C. Collier:

While riding along a mountain road in San Diego, Cal., Col. Collier came upon a dilapidated corral fence upon which hung a sign bearing the following announcement: "For Sail." A bright looking small boy sat on the fence beside the sign and Col. Collier asked him: "When does this ranch sail?"

The small boy glanced up quickly at Col. Collier, smiled and said: "When some sucker comes along who can raise the wind." Col. Collier doffed his sombrero, thanked the lad for his information and rode on his way feeling greatly enlightened, for he understood that "raising the wind" meant raising money.

A Modern Linguist

The class in English was being taught the intricacies of forming adjectives from nouns by the addition of -ous. Examples were given such as hazardous from hazard, meaning full of hazard; contemptuous, full of contempt; venturous, full of venture, etc. Then the class was asked to give examples of their own.

"I have one, sir," piped up little Reginald.

"What is it?" asked the teacher.

"Pious, full of pie," beamed the scholar.—P. R. Hayward.

Safety First

"It would please me very much, Miss Stout," said Mr. Mugley, "if you would go to the theater with me this evening."

"Have you secured the seats?" inquired Miss Vera Stout.

"Oh, come now," he protested, "you're not so heavy as all that."

In Need

For three successive nights Newpop had walked the floor with the baby. On the fourth night he became desperate and bought a bottle of soothing syrup.

"Why, James," exclained his wife, when she saw the bottle, "what did you buy that for? Don't you know it is very dangerous to give to a child anything like that?"

"Don't worry," was her husband's reply. "I'm going to take it myself."—Wisconsin State Journal.

Lucky

"My cousin is to be married on the thirteenth of next month."

"On the thirteenth? I should think she would be afraid of such an unlucky date."

"Evidently you have never seen my cousin. Any day would be a lucky day for her to get married."

Overland

TRADE MARK REG.

So much more for the money

This car sells itself to anyone who starts out to get the most for his money in a good, big, roomy, five passenger car.

Comparison proves a plain case to anyone who cares to know.

You don't have to be an expert or have any special knowledge to determine the big extra value you get in this car.

Its advantages stand out so boldly that they cannot be overlooked in a comparison with any car selling for $795—or for a great deal more.

You get more power—35 horsepower motor—more than 250,000 in use.

You get more room—112-inch wheelbase.

You get greater comfort—long, 48-inch cantilever rear springs and 4-inch tires.

You get greater convenience—electrical control buttons on steering column.

You get bigger, safer brakes—service, 13⅜ x 2¼; emergency, 13 x 2¼.

You get better cooling—you never heard of an Overland overheating.

This is the biggest and best car we have ever been able to sell until now for less than $1000.

In fact it's a thousand dollar car which the economies of our enormously increased production enable us to sell for $795.

If you want the most for your money in a big comfortable, roomy, five passenger car of long proven mechanical superiority—here it is—no argument possible—you can determine the facts for yourself.

And back of the car is the largest and most successful automobile concern in the world that produces cars of this size and class.

And back of it also are the best established, most successful automobile dealers to be found.

You can't beat such a combination—a car that everyone knows is 100% right mechanically—a car that is priced so low that extra value sticks out all over it—a big, strong thoroughly established concern back of the car and a successful enterprising local dealer to do business with.

See the Overland dealer in your nearest town—he will gladly show you the car — demonstrate it, give you a prompt delivery—and render prompt, efficient service as long as you own it.

Now is the time to buy—when you've time to enjoy your car and lots of good driving weather.

And when things freeze up, put on your curtains and go anywhere comfortably in any kind of weather all winter long.

Same model, six cylinder—35-40 horse power—116-inch wheelbase, $925.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

If Food Prices Are High, How About Everyday Shoes Going to $12 a Pair?

So much noise is being made by those who are clamoring vociferously for an embargo to stop the exportation of food stuffs that attention is diverted from the rapidly diminishing supply of another article of necessary utility which now threatens a degree of scarcity that would cause more inconvenience and distress than the prevailing high food prices.,

The prices of shoes have nearly doubled within the last few months and they are being marked up each week; not only that but in many instances they are being made of inferior material. It is certain that they will go higher and, unless some vigorous preventive measures are taken at once, will very soon reach a figure that is prohibitive to the family of average income.

The cause is found in the scarcity of leather due to the extraordinary demand of Europe for war purposes having overtaxed the leather resources of the world. Many of our shoe factories have been running overtime to fill profitable war orders while foreign governments have been and still are buying up enormous quantities of leather in this country for military purposes. The supply is nearly exhausted and what little remains is mostly in the hands of speculators. The shoe manufacturers are alarmed at the shortage. They assert that the present supply will not last them over four months at the most and that, unless something is done immediately to relieve the situation, they will soon have to run with half crews although they have orders enough to keep their factories busy night and day if they could get the necessary leather.

They predict that, if the present condition continues, medium grade shoes will be twelve dollars a pair before spring and other grades in proportion, which means, of course, that many families would have to go barefooted,---even at that price there would not be shoes enough to supply domestic requirements. Besides the suffering caused by the high prices and shortage of shoes nearly one half the hands now employed in the shoe factories will be thrown out of employment, a calamity which high food prices are not likely to entail.

The shoe manufacturers and, at their instigation, the retailers have petitioned Congress for an investigation of the leather situation and for some means of relief. Just what means would be effective they fail to make clear, but Congressman Michael P. Phelan, of Massachusetts, to whom they have appealed, has promised his best efforts to stir Congress to take action. Let us hope that some adequate measure may be devised to mitigate this burden of inconvenience and expense which threatens the people.

The shoe and leather situation is one of many forceful illustrations arising out of present war conditions that might be cited to show the injustice of singling out farm products as the subject of embargo while permitting free exportation of all other commodities with consequent war prices. Whether the government has the power to impose an embargo for the sole purpose of reducing the open market price of an article is doubted. But if there is to be an embargo let it cover everything that is above normal price in consequence of the war. That would be only fair, but it would never go because every fellow that is shouting for an embargo wants it on the other fellow's products—NOT on his own.

The Temperance Cause Gaining Ground

TO those who are sincerely interested in the uplift of humanity it is encouraging to note the growing sentiment in favor of total abstinence from the use, and against permitting the sale of intoxicating liquors. On the first day of last November Virginia, the latest accession to the splendid array of prohibition states, put into successful operation the most drastic law yet devised for the suppression of the liquor evil. Evidently the Old Dominion is in earnest in her purpose to banish intemperance for she has not only abolished the manufacture and sale of liquor within her borders but does not permit anybody to bring into the State, even for personal use, more than one gallon of wine or distilled liquor or three gallons of beer at a time, and that not oftener than once a month.

And this law is being enforced with satisfactory results, for the people of Virginia are in no mood to be trifled with as those of certain other prohibition states have been by negligent or corrupt nullification at the hands of local officers. The Virginia statute provides a speedy means of removing any official that neglects to perform his duty faithfully with respect to the suppression of the liquor traffic.

Bells chimed and bonfires blazed in token of public rejoicing on the last night in October when eight hundred saloons, bars and poison shops in Richmond, Norfolk, Lynchburg, Petersburg and Newport News closed their doors never to open for pandering to vice through commerce in the great destroyer of men.

Nineteen states now absolutely prohibit the sale of liquor, and the increase in the area of dry territory in the local option states during the past year indicates that many of the latter will soon adopt state-wide prohibition. All this has given such an impetus to the movement for nation-wide prohibition that the Anti-Saloon League predicts that the year 1920 will witness the closing of the last saloon in the United States. A bill to prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquor in the District of Columbia is being debated in Congress with fair prospects of its adoption at the present session.

It is a national disgrace that our government licenses the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii and Porto Rico, all territories over which Congress has complete power. Congress has always taken pains to prohibit and severely punish the sale of intoxicants among the Indian tribes. Can't our lawmakers see that what is essential for the uplift of the red men is equally necessary for the regeneration of the multitude of white men and negroes that are making besotted wrecks of themselves, causing inexpressible anguish to their families and inestimable injury to the community? It is no credit to us that we make a better law for the Indians, whom we govern without their consent, than we do for ourselves, for our action is based on our false conceit that we, as a race, have strength of mind and will to use the seductive stuff without danger of falling victims to its destructive influence. The drink habit is not confined to men of low intellect and untutored mind. Do you know of a community however small that does not present a lamentable example of a man of uncommon ability ruined by alcoholism? But as a people we are awakening to the necessity of invoking the strong arm of the federal government to extinguish throughout the length and breadth of the land this menace that is no respecter of race, color or station in life.

Giving Away the People's Birthright

THE habit, to which Congress and our state legislatures are prone, of leaving the stable unlocked until after the horse is stolen—not one only but horse after horse and of even giving the thieves a helping hand should be severely rebuked and summarily ended forever. If it was their own property we would not care, but it is the people's birthright of which the lawmakers are so negligent and prodigal.

The numerous state and federal prosecutions and investigations of the trusts—notably of the coal and oil interests—have not afforded the people any relief but have loaded them with the expense of these fruitless proceedings designed to appease their wrath. If our legislators had not in times past given away the natural resources of the country and permitted them to come under the power of private monopoly, we should have no coal and oil troubles to deal with because the sources of supply would have remained subject to governmental control. Only a few years ago the immensely valuable coal lands of Alaska were barely rescued from the maw of a capitalistic octopus when, at the last moment, public exposure of the fraud compelled official action to thwart the scheme.

While the government is investigating the evils resulting from the concentration of ownership of our natural resources in the hands of a few individuals and corporations, and is considering recommendations for government ownership of certain public utilities, Congress is facing the other way by proposing to give away, practically free, some of the most valuable natural resources that still pertain to the public domain.

The Senate has passed the Shields waterpower bill which, according to the published statement by Gifford Pinchot, President of the National Conservation Association, makes a free gift, to the waterpower interests, of public waterpowers on our navigable streams estimated at sixty million horsepower, or double the power of every kind now used to run every train, trolley, factory, shop, mill, boat, mine and electric plant in the United States. This bill has passed the House, but in a different and better form. It is now in Committee of Conference to determine the form which shall finally be adopted, and it is claimed that the waterpower interests expect to control the action of the Conference. This raid on the public property failed at the previous session because the editors of the country rallied to the defense of the public rights, and the bill was postponed until after election.

The Myers bill, now on the Senate calendar for early consideration at the present session, does for the waterpowers on the public lands what the Shields bill does on navigable streams.

These two bills are bad enough, but the oil lands provisions of the Phelan bill, now before Congress, are even worse. Mr. Pinchot says: "This bill disposes of vast areas of public oil lands on terms unfair to the public. It is almost unbelievable, but this measure actually gives away the fuel oil reserves of the United States Navy to claimants whom the Supreme Court recently declared to have no legal rights whatever. The efficiency of the Navy, our first and most important line of National defense, is to be sacrificed for the profits of the Standard Oil Company, the Santa Fe Railroad interests, and a few other claimants, who want what they have no right to get."

The Navy Department has entered a vigorous protest on the ground that: "Oil burning naval vessels possess such manifold military advantages over coal burning vessels that it would be practically suicidal from a military point of view for the Navy Department to abandon the policy of building oil burning ships," but the passage of the Phelan bill would probably compel the Navy Department to return to coal burning ships for want of a reliable source of oil supply.

These three iniquitous bills may yet be killed if our Senators and Congressmen hear from their constituents on this subject at once. Don't you think the government should retain ownership of its oil lands and develop its waterpowers for the benefit of the people? Now is the time for the people to raise the hue and cry, and lock the stable before these three horses are stolen.

A New Year Eve Adventure

By Joseph F. Novak

SHUDDERING with the cold as an icy blast of wind swooped down upon him, John Gray thrust his hands deeper into his pockets, drew his head into his collar in the manner of a tortoise, and shrinking into himself as if to expose as little of his bulk to the wind as possible, he trudged on.

It was snowing, a blinding, wet, sleety downpour, which covered street and sidewalk with ankle-deep, whitening slush, and frosted the tall buildings whose high tops seemed to vanish into the night.

Gray loitered along; it was late and near to the close of the Old Year. The inclement weather kept the city streets well vacated, and those who celebrated the New Year Wassail were cozily ensconced in warm, bright-lighted cafes.

Gray felt himself an outcast, and indeed he had been for sometime, having been only that day released from the "cooler," convict parlance for the jail. But his record there had been a good one, and he had had the usual time deducted for good behavior. This incarceration had been his first, but he had deserved it and he knew it. It had come about through a drunken brawl.

He passed a gaily lighted rathskeller, which held forth a welcome. Almost unconsciously, he passed the back of his hand over his lips, and hesitated. But only for a moment, for somehow, the thought of the sermon he had heard in jail on Christmas Day, the week before, came back to him, and with it, the resolution he had made to hit the straight trail when he was freed. Tomorrow would see the birth of the New Year, this eve was that appointed for the death of the old, and with it, he hoped, of his old life. Tomorrow a New Year would arise, like a Phœnix from the ashes of the old, he too wished that he might rise, a new man, endued with new life and new respect.

But his good resolution weakened as he saw the resorts of the wealthy, where money flowed for vanities and nonsense. What a little of it would be required to put him on his feet.

He wandered on, passing more brilliantly lighted cafes, hotels and clubs. In the windows hung withered holly framing wishes for a Happy New Year.

"Happy New Year," he read bitterly, "much of a Happy New Year it is for one who is cold and miserable and hungry and just out of the cooler."

And now suddenly, through the shrieking wind, church bells clanged out and factory whistles screamed, proclaiming the arrival of the New Year. In spite of himself, Gray's pulses quickened. Perhaps he was too easily discouraged; one couldn't always expect to find a job within twelve hours of their release from jail. Besides he was cold and tired; possibly the best thing to do would be to go to his "five-cent flop," and perhaps the morrow would bring forth better luck. Yes, that would be the best plan—sleep and rest for the time being, and trust in the message of the clanging heralds of the New Year.

He had walked a considerable distance from the business section of the city, and now trudged along a boulevard whereon faced fashionable hotels, clubs and restaurants. The street was almost deserted, but the gaily lighted windows, and at the curb the congregated motors, told of the merry-making within.

Gray turned about to return to the business section wherein was located the "flop," and started to walk at a brisk pace, but as he was crossing an alley, he happened to notice what seemed a human form, crunched in a heap. The alley was dark and forbidding, but to a man who is down and out, there is no danger in darkness, and so Gray went to investigate.

He reached the prostrate form and found it to be a man indeed. He was lying on his side, his eyes closed. He was clad in an opera coat and dress suit, and his white shirt front was nicely splashed with sleet and mud.

"Drunk, I suppose," Gray communed with himself. "One of those little sons of the rich, evidently. But still, he can't lie here. I guess I'd better call the police."

He felt the man's pulse, thinking he might be frozen. But he was still warm. Then with a hasty glance around, to assure himself that no one observed him, Gray felt into the man's pocket. His hand encountered what seemed to be a well-filled purse. Then he went to the man's vest and saw he wore a watch and chain with a heavily jeweled charm.

Temptation beckoned.

"No," Gray fought with the tempter, "no, I won't take it, though it's no more than this 'soak' deserves."

A sudden thought came to him.

"Suppose I bring him safely home? When he found his valuables safe, he'd probably believe in my sincerity in wishing to hit the straight trail, and maybe he'd help to get me a job of some kind. A fellow like this probably could. I believe I'll do it."

He took out the purse and from it a calling card. Then gathering the inert form in his arms, he brought the man to his feet, and with his arm about his shoulder, Gray half carried, half walked him down the alley to a bleary light, in the flare of which, he read the name and address on the card he had taken from the man's purse.

"Marvin Lyford, 4225 Drive Boulevard."

"Went down the last minute on his way home," thought Gray, for the address on Drive Boulevard was but a few blocks distant.

Avoiding the streets wherever possible, Gray bore his burden along. Once he encountered a pedestrian, but this individual evidently decided that Gray was the chosen pilot for the gentleman with two sheets in the wind, and so said nothing.

The address on Drive Boulevard was an ultra-fashionable looking old residence, with broad, snow-covered lawns, unbroken by a single step.

Gray helped the man up the steps and rang the bell, but though he rang several times, there came no answer. Even the servants, it seemed, were away.

Gray was undecided as to what to do now, but finally chanced searching the man for his keys. These he found, and one of them opened the door.

It was an odd sensation, this breaking into a house, but Gray now felt himself under the instructions of the man he brought home, so he closed the door, found the electric switch and turned on the light, then looked around.

The light, softly shaded, revealed a rich reception room, with rich hangings to the left which suggested an entrance to luxuriously furnished drawing-rooms beyond. To the right was a massive staircase leading to rooms above. Up this stair, Gray carried his charge and sat him in a hall seat while he examined the rooms which opened on to the corridor, until he came to one which he decided might belong to Mr. Lyford. So he left it lit up and went out into the hall and brought the man into the room and laid him on the bed.

But now he observed something that caused him to smother an involuntary oath and the next minute to investigate. The fellow was bleeding! He leaned close to the prostrate man's face. That breath was not that of a drunkard. The man was hurt. Had he been assaulted? And if he had, how came it that his assailants had not robbed him?

Feeling that he might just as well go the limit now that he had gone so far, Gray quickly undressed the unconscious man and found that he had been shot!

Why?

He stepped to the connecting bathroom and turned on the water. He found it at a boiling point, it being kept so by the automatic gas-heater. He filled a basin with the water and picking up several towels, he washed, and then roughly dressed the wound, and this finished, he bethought himself of his next step.

He must call a doctor. But who? Most people had their own family doctor—ah, possibly this very necessary person's 'phone number might be on a slip with the fire and police call which most people kept handy for emergency tacked up beside the 'phone. He would see.

So Gray went down-stairs and prowled around until he came to the 'phone in the high-ceiled somber library, and luckily he found a 'phone index, and on it the name of "Dr. Stone" whom, he concluded, was the family doctor and the one to be summoned.

He picked up the receiver and called the doctor.

After a time, he got a connection, and a sleepy voice answered that the doctor could be reached at the Century Club if the call was urgent. And the number of the club was given.

Gray thanked the sleepy voice, and when the line was free again, he called the Century Club.

"Dr. Stone, please, I must talk to him. An urgent case."

For some moments he sat rigid at the 'phone. Then a voice answered.

"Hello," Gray shouted into the transmitter. "Dr. Stone? I am calling from the Lyford residence. Marvin Lyford has been shot and your services are required. I don't know how serious the matter is."

Odd that a doctor should be so astounded at the news. But there was no doubt that he had been, for he had smothered an exclamation. Was it of horror, surprise or amazement? Gray, listening, could not determine. Odd too, that a doctor should stammer over the matter.

"Am I sure this is the Lyford residence at 4225 Drive Boulevard? Of course.....Do hurry, I'm afraid the man has lost a great deal of blood," said Gray. Still the doctor at the other end of the wire seemed to hesitate.

"Which Lyford is it? I don't know. Marvin is the name, a man who appears to be about thirty-five years old. Who am I? Oh, don't argue, just come. You don't know me, you've never seen me before.....Well, if you don't come, I shall call someone else.....Oh, you will? Very well, then. I'll wait for you. In fifteen minutes? Good, the sooner the better. Thank you. Good by."

"Fool," growled Gray. "You'd think rich little boys can try adventurous stunts and always come away with a whole skin. Well, I hope that 'quack' hurries."

He sat down to await the coming of the doctor, and while waiting, he studied the unconscious man's face. It was not a prepossessing face. It was in a way, handsome, but not the kind of handsomeness that suggests good nature or benevolence. Rather it was of a hard, sneering sort, and altogether disagreeable when closely observed. It was made further disagreeable in appearance by a peculiar little break in the lip, much as if the man had had his mouth "smashed" at one time. But evidently he was a gentleman and debonair, for his garments, both outer and under were of most expensive material.

Gray decided that he had probably had his trouble for nothing, but he would see, nevertheless.

A little gold clock on a table nearby slowly ticked off the minutes, and after ten of them had gone, the bell rang.

The doctor, of course, so Gray hurried down the stairs and opened the door.

Two men stood on the threshhold, one with a small case in his hand, the doctor, and another man, seemingly about twenty-five years of age. He was a nice-featured, boyish young man, with a healthy glow in his cheeks and his lustrous eyes seemed unduly excited.

"My assistant," said Doctor Stone, as Gray eyed the young man. "Where is Lyford?"

"Up-stairs, and you'd better hurry. I didn't know he had been——"

Gray got no further, for the "assistant" had slowly circled behind him. The next minute, a strong, healthy young arm came about his throat, and an uncomfortable looking revolver was thrust into his face.

"Don't move, or you'll get this!" the young man threatened. Then turning to the doctor, he said: "Better tie him up, and I'll watch the stairway for any others."

"But I say!" exclaimed the bewildered Gray, "what's the matter with you? What do you think I am? Let me explain, won't you?"

"Shut up," answered the doctor pleasantly. "You'll have plenty of time for explanations. How many more of you are there in the house?"

"Why, look here! Man alive! What do you think——" persisted Gray, though he made no effort to loose himself from his bonds. "There's no one else in the house, and as for me, well I simply piloted Lyford home, that's all."

"Oh, you did, did you?" said the doctor, pleasantly sarcastic. "You certainly have the brass, though. But you're balled up on your game. Careful, boy," he cautioned to the young man, who, having lighted the rooms down-stairs, now started up the staircase.

Suddenly from above, there came a wild yell of laughter, and the voice of the young man, saying:

"Good Lord, doctor, are we dreaming? What kind of 'con' game is this? Bring that fellow up here!"

Gray was marched up the stairs and ushered into the room where he had lately left his charge. The fellow was still lying on the bed just as he had left him, and the young man and the doctor looked at each other and roared, but there was a note of grimness in their mirth, nevertheless.

"Patch him up, Stone, and I'll call the police," said the young fellow. "Some turn things have taken! It seems to be our inning now."

The doctor gave his attention to the man on the bed, while the young fellow gave his attention to Gray.

"Do you know who that fellow is?" demanded the young fellow. He was a nice young chap, and seemed incapable of the melodramatic actions he had indulged a short time before.

"I don't know him," Gray returned. "But from his cards and the name on his purse, I suppose he is Marvin Lyford."

"Where is the purse?" questioned the young fellow.

"In the drawer of that dresser, together with Lyford's watch and keys."

The young man went to the drawer, opened it and seemed amazed. He quickly scanned the contents of the purse and seemed satisfied.

He turned about, and Gray felt the keen eyes search his face. The face that was scanned was not bad, nor vicious. It was worn and thin, but not sneaking nor dishonest, only a little weak, the face of a man who had struggled with life, had tried to taste of its gaieties and in an evil moment had lost.

Gray felt the inventory of his face, of his thin, worn suit, poor shoes and old linen. And too he felt kindness and sympathy come into the eyes that "sized him up."

At length the young fellow spoke.

"Tell me all about it."

And Gray did. Told of having been released from jail in the afternoon of New Year's Eve, of his resolution to go straight, of his inability to find a job, and of his hope that the next day would bring something and of his decision to go to a lodging house and sleep, when he noted an inert figure, well dressed, lying in an alley.

"I thought he had two sheets in the wind, and that he fell down, dead drunk. I knew the simplest way out of the matter would be to call the police, but when I saw the expensive watch, and felt the big roll, I thought I'd bring him home, and then, when he was out of his cups, I'd tell him what I had done. You see my interest was selfish. But anyhow, I thought this way he'd see that I wanted to be honest and would give me a hand, for it would have been easy for me to pick his pocket and steal his watch. But instead, I picked him up and half-carried, half-walked him home, and then when I brought him here, I saw that he was bleeding. I looked for the 'phone and found Dr. Stone's number and supposing he was Lyford's family doctor, I called him. And—well, I guess I needn't go on," and Gray smiled faintly, his smile keeping company with the one dancing about the young man's lips.

"You've told your story, my man, now let me tell you mine. I am a member of the Century Club, a club wherein we are all equals. We don't consider it necessary to put our things under lock and key. Well, a gentleman with high references visited us, and he was welcomed heartily. During the evening someone suggested a game of bowling and we went down to the bowling alley with this gentleman of high repute, Mr. St. Claire Lee of New York and Richmond.

"We took off our coats and vests and started in to bowl, when Mr. Lee begged to be excused. He was detected in the act of vanishing without bidding us farewell, and almost simultaneously, I noticed that my dress-coat was missing, and it contained my purse in which I had nearly a thousand dollars, to say nothing of my watch, chain and charm worth probably fifteen hundred. Mr. Lee was making an exit in an unconventional manner when he was called to halt, and not obeying instructions, he was plugged. He ran and we followed. But not being detectives, we didn't know he'd shelter himself in the building where he was most wanted, and of course we didn't look for him under our noses. From your story, I think you found this man in an alley alongside the Century Club. I happen to be Marvin Lyford and the gentleman on the bed is our illustrious guest, Mr. St. Claire Lee of New York and Richmond, but more appropriately known as 'Lightning Change Larry' of Sing Sing. You have apprehended a slick crook, my man, and that's an accomplishment. Allow me to congratulate you," and he held out his hand.

Gray, astounded, nevertheless took the proffered hand. It was warm and boyish and thrilled with life and health.

"Now tell me your name, and what you did before you spent some time—er, of enforced seclusion as a guest of the county," Lyford went on mischievously.

"John Gray's my name, and I was a chauffeur," Gray replied, hoping he could get a similar job.

"Guess I can fix you up on that," commented Lyford. "Now, you'd better be my guest for tonight, for I don't want you to go back to the retreat of tramps and hoboes. That's beneath the dignity of a sleuth when he's not on the job. How's that fellow?" Lyford suddenly interpolated, turning to the doctor.

"He's popped pretty badly and may be done for," returned the doctor. "You'd better hurry that police call."

Lyford went down to the telephone, and after a wait of some time, an ambulance came and very quietly the wounded crook was carried to the ambulance and then to the hospital of the jail. His injury proved fatal a few days later.

After the man was taken away, Dr. Stone bade the young men good night, apologizing to Gray for their rough treatment, and left. Gray was alone with his new-found friend.

"I'll try and rouse up the servants and see if we can't have something to eat," Lyford now said, "and in the meantime, you'd better take a bath."

Gray accepted gratefully, and when he had finished, he clad himself in a suit of Lyford's pajamas, which though rather short (for Gray was much taller than Lyford) did very well. Then he put on the bath-robe and stepped into the bedroom.

Lyford likewise had disrobed and now lounged in comfortable negligee. The butler had been roused up and had managed to get together a light lunch that tasted good to Gray after his rather strenuous night.

The lunch finished, the two men chatted a while, then Lyford suggested bed, at the same time giving Gray the big comfortable davenport on which to sleep for the butler had placed soft pillows and heavy blankets upon it.

Lyford soon fell asleep, but Gray, though comfortable beyond dreams, laid awake thoughtfully, wondering if it were not all a dream. When morning came, it found him still in his reverie.

Presently Lyford awoke, and calling out a cheery good morning, he got up and threw his bath-robe about him.

"I'm playing bachelor," he said, "for the rest of the family are everywhere, I guess" (meaning that the various members of the family were in various places as guests). He threw back the heavy window hanging, and ran up the shade. The snow was still falling, but it fell less tempestuously. The world gleamed in wondrous purity.

"New Year's Day," Lyford said, "a clean, white, spotless day. A good time for us to make New Year resolutions, one of which will be that we'll be good friends. Shake!"

They did, the man of wealth and leisure and the outcast who had been reclaimed.

Put upon his mettle, Gray made good, as the passing of the days showed.

A CALENDAR PARTY

by Elizabeth C. Read

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

AN informal Holiday Party which comes after the stress of Christmas "preparedness," is a welcome diversion, and should reflect the gayety of the season. The house, already in holiday attire, is a point gained, so that one's entire attention may be directed toward other features.

A calendar party suggests itself as appropriate, and it may be elaborate or simple as individual taste prescribes; but, however simple, it is of necessity picturesque because of the variety and color which are introduced.

Invitations, suggestive of the season, request each guest to represent a certain month of the year, or one of the four seasons—in any way, of course, which the ingenuity of the guest dictates.

The months are easily differentiated by several distinguishing characteristics, such as holiday events, weather conditions, sports peculiar to them, etc.; and as practically every month admits of double treatment, the hostess is enabled to extend her guest list by repeating the month without monotony. For instance, January has the New Year, and mid-winter sports; February, Washington's and Lincoln's birthdays, and St. Valentine's; March, St. Patrick's day, and the "lion" and "lamb" weather; next comes April Fool's day, showers, and the opening of the baseball season; May brings May day, moving day, and spring flowers; June, roses, Flag day, and commencement; July suggests Uncle Sam, Columbia, and Fourth of July symbols; August, Emancipation day, and the end of summer; then come Labor Day and Columbus day for September and October, respectively, also hints of autumn; November gives us Thanksgiving and Election day; then Christmas, and the end of the year for December. Discernment on the part of the hostess, in designating who shall represent what, will add much to the interest of the occasion.

Entertainment features should carry out the general idea of the party, an element of contest adding zest, and furnishing the excuse for prizes or suitable souvenirs. Thus, a calendar game: Small envelopes, each containing a card bearing the name of a different month, are drawn by, or distributed at random, among the guests. The letters composing the names of the month are to be used, in sequence, as the initial letters of words will combine into a telegram, or an epigram; or, for a New Year party, into a "toast" or a "resolution." Example: Epigrams for *M*arch-*M*alice *A*nd *R*evenge *C*onfound *H*appiness. *M*aid *A*nd *R*omance *C*onnote *H*appiness. Toast for May, Here's to "Me And You."

This done, each guest replaces the card in the envelope, upon which he writes his name; the envelopes are then exchanged, and the contents are read aloud without revealing the names of the writers—a vote being taken to decide upon the prize winner. The one requirement in judging these compositions is that they make good sense, though some latitude (such as *p*hunetic spelling) might be allowed in working in difficult initials; or, if toasts or resolutions are chosen as a subject, the words "Here's to" or "I resolve," would be understood.

Other calendar suggestions, to furnish amusement, follow:

(1.) A Calendar Marathon, or a tight-rope race is represented by extending a narrow white or red ribbon across the floor, changing its direction at four points, significant of the seasons, but in reality, to make the race a little more difficult. Each guest is asked to walk the rope, from season to season, by looking at his feet through the reverse end of opera glasses; this gives one a sense of elevation, which affects the equilibrium, and it is highly amusing. Prizes may be awarded either for time or distance, as they may not all reach the end of the year.

(2). Twelve lighted candles, suggestive of the months of the year, are placed on the floor at intervals convenient for walking in and out between each two of them. The guests, in turn, are blindfolded and asked to walk through the line of candles without touching them—the real amusement centering in the first and last candidates, who should be wisely chosen as to temperament, etc. A woman of conspicuous dignity is chosen first, and as she threads her way between the candles, she is kindly admonished against the flame catching her skirts; but when the blindfold is removed, she finds that the candles were "snuffed" before she began her tortuous way. The intermediate candidates, who care to participate, merely avoid, if possible, touching the candles. The last one, however, is the "smart" man who is always "getting one" on the other fellow, and as he cautiously maneuvers, he is constantly warned to look out for May, July, or September; but, at last, proud of his success, the handkerchief is taken from his eyes to disclose the fact that all of the candles had been removed after he was blindfolded. A paper fool's cap is a suitable reward for his skill.

A date game, requiring a little thought, may also be introduced. Cards, or slips of paper (corresponding to number of guests) bear the heading "Discoveries and Inventions;" below is a list of dates, at the right of which is the corresponding discovery or invention written with the letters transposed.

Example: 1875 plentoehe. (Inv.) Answer, Telephone.

Interest is increased if the dates cover a wide range in time and subject; for instance, from the invention of printing—the discovery of the Hudson river or Anaesthesia, to present day utilities, such as the automobile, aeroplane, wireless, etc. An element of humor may be injected by including political issues.

Example: 1912, louMseloB. (Inv. -paent repudiated). Ans. Bull Moose. "Watchful waiting," preparedness, hyphenism, may be similarly used.

Nerine's Second Choice

Stooping over her sister she stirred the fire into a blaze.

As they vanished in the chilly passage, the bell, with one final reverberation, stopped.

Kit pushed Maurice's eager hands and smooth cool face away angrily—ungratefully.

By Adelaide Stirling

THE January evening had darkened down early in fine showers of rain and sleet. A damp, cutting draught came in at the window seat just where Nerine Lispenard knelt where she had knelt in spite of it for the past twenty minutes, her face pressed against the cold window pane.

Before her the garden lay dark, wintry, sodden; just down by the gate were dimly to be seen through the sleet the lamps of a small brougham, waiting there as it had waited, Nerine thought, for centuries.

As she made this reflection for the tenth time the lights, with a jerk and a plunge, vanished.

There was nothing now to see but the gloom, yet the girl still stared uncertainly out through the glass, all blurred by her breath.

Had those lamps really gone—gone to the station—or had they merely been sent back to the stable?

The door of the room behind her opened quickly, and there came in two girls, one as tall as Nerine herself, the other a tiny creature, but both laughing like two elves.

"Gone! gone! gone!" cried the foremost. "But oh, my heart was in my mouth!"

"He passed me on the very doorstep!" The little girl was a mere bundle of wraps and furs as she came into the firelight. "If the sleet had not been driving into his august countenance he must have seen me."

"No!" cried Nerine, joyfully. She leaped forward and made a dive at the speaker. "You dear Kit, how did you ever get here?"

"I walked," said Miss Belton, sedately. "From the station, that is. Something told me he might have missed his train, so that I did not engage the wheels of a chariot. My boxes repose in the waiting-room in consequence."

"He missed two trains," observed the tall girl, who was Miss Lispenard the elder, as she sat down on the hearth rug and spread out two chilled hands to the fire. "And he was on the point of countermanding the carriage this last time, till I thought despair would have killed me."

There was no note of laughter in her voice; her tragic gesture was perfectly serious and equally serious her sister's response.

"Thank heaven! For one blessed month we are rid of him."

"Is he any—worse—then?" inquired Miss Belton, taking off her outer garments and casting them on the floor.

Nerine looked at her.

"Worse? Not even he could be worse and remain human. My dearest Kit, this is a frightful place you have come to; you will hardly have the comforts of life." Stooping over her sister, she stirred the fire into a blaze that lighted up the bare old room. "You shall hear the worst," she said. "Never say that we did not prepare you for three weeks of bread and scrape."

Agatha Lispenard, Nerine's elder by five minutes, looked up judicially.

"Don't frighten her," she said. "She will go home tomorrow if she thinks we are as poor as all that."

Kitty Belton put a quick hand on Agatha's shoulder.

"Agatha," she cried, "you forget. You said"—reproachfully—"that if I came we would do like men who keep bachelor's hall, pay share and share alike."

"I may have said it"—dryly—"but I didn't mean it. You know, Kit, that Nerine and I have always enough for you."

"Very well." Miss Belton got up and picked her wet hat off the floor. "But if I am not to share expenses I am going to catch the six-thirty train back to Belton."

"You will catch nothing like it!" exclaimed Nerine.

"Unless Agatha keeps her promise," pinning on her hat. "I mean it. I am angry—furious!"

"Oh, pay it all, if you like!" Agatha said, crossly, "so long as you stay. We can't spend a fortune, even with the most riotous living. Only think," she went on, her lovely face flushing, "he has dismissed all the servants but the kitchen maid, and the horses are to go out for exercise only, no matter how much we want them. Are you prepared, Kit, to make your own bed of a morning?"

"And to lie on it at night," said Kit, discarding her hat once more. "Is that all he's done? I thought he had probably left out just so much groceries and provisions, and had sent written orders to the grocer and butcher regulating your allowances."

Agatha looked at Nerine in curious silence. Kit's jest, for some reason, fell flat.

There was a brief silence, and then Kate asked:

"Now, girls—both of you—where do you think he's gone?"

"Kamtchatka!" said Nerine, idly wondering if she ought not to go and assist Jane with the evening meal.

"He went," said Agatha, deliberately, "to Monte Carlo."

"Monte Carlo?" cried Nerine. "Mr. Mayne went to——"

"Monte Carlo," with a nod of her black head. "How do I know? He gave Jones an address to which his letters were to be forwarded, and Jones lost the card. I suspect he would have been severely reproved by Mr. Mayne, for I met him standing outside the door afraid to knock. He could have let me walk on him when I produced the precious card."

"You gave it to him? How could you? The man is a reptile."

He is better than his master, even so. Fancy the old hypocrite, who says 'Cards and dancing are the vices of the century,'" and she imitated the clear-cut enunciation of a familiar voice. "He would have to get to heaven as best he might if his beloved Plymouth Brethren knew where he was going."

"I hope he'll gamble away all his money," Nerine said, earnestly. Had not all that money been ground out of her and hers, saved off their young backs, out of their hungry mouths for this past ten years? Ever since their mother had died and left them unreservedly to the tender stepfatherly care of Clarence Mayne.

"I wonder," said Kitty Belton, "how your mother came to marry him!"

"Poor little mother!" Agatha said. "She was only twenty-seven when she died, and she had lived such a pleasant, easy life all her days that she never thought there was any other sort possibl."

"Did she leave him everything?" asked Kit, more as a sign of sympathy than anything else, for she knew the Lispenard tragi-comedy by heart.

"Only till we are twenty-one," cried both sisters in a breath. "Then horses, income—everything is ours!"

Nerine stared at the fire with an unpleasant look in her gray eyes.

"And then," she remarked, slowly, "there will be short work of Clarence Mayne. Pouf! He will go like that puff of smoke there will when the fire begins to blaze."

"There are really only ten months more," said Agatha, briskly. "We are twenty now, Kit!"

"Old Mayne has made the most of the last ten years," Nerine went on, somberly. "He has saved and pinched and scraped! Kit, you should see our garments. But when you do," smiling sadly, "I don't believe you will care to walk out with us."

"But he can't save much on his own account," said Kit. "He has two horses, and he spares no expense at the club."

"He has two horses," Agatha assented, "but he can't help that. There was some clause in the will about that. He would infinitely prefer two donkeys!" laughing. "He can't ride. And when he drives in the brougham he sits always with one hand on the door."

"Don't talk about him!" Nerine cried. "There are only ten months more of his regime, and for one month of that he will be away. Kit, how did you get your people to let you come to us?"

With a deal of trouble, Miss Belton might have said truthfully. Clarence Mayne's house was not in the best of odor with the world, nor were Agatha and Nerine themselves precisely regarded with approval. Perhaps no one ever understands exactly why other people are just what they are. Sir William and Lady Belton thought that their cousin's children might have managed better, been bolder, braver than they were. Surely they need not have shut themselves up as they did till their father's old friends, beyond a yearly call, left unreturned for months, knew nothing of them. And when they were invited to Belton they need not always have sent a polite refusal!

It was with a mule's obstinacy that Kit had obtained permission to go and stay with cousins whose conduct was chiefly remarkable for eccentricity. But come she had and she passed over Nerine's question skillfully.

"Oh, I wanted to come," was all she said. "No wonder the girls had refused to go to Belton at Christmas," she thought, as the fire blazed up and she saw the woefully shabby dresses they wore. "Mamma could never be made to understand that a man who called himself a gentleman could refuse his stepdaughters gowns to wear."

Clarence Mayne's cleverness was a complete concealment of art. He was an interloper, all but an adventurer, when he married Mrs. Lispenard. But on those rare occasions when he had encountered the hostile Lispenard connections, the charm of his perfect manners had made them forget those undeniable facts. Just as the rector of St. Jude's, when he found that on the death of Mrs. Mayne church subscriptions would cease, could say nothing to Mr. Mayne's discredit when that gentleman confessed to him that belonging as he did to the strictest division of the Plymouth Brethren, his conscience could not allow of his assisting in the smallest degree in the work of the Established Church.

As for that business of Maurice Lispenard, doubtless Mr. Mayne was to be blamed. The boy who should, in the natural course of events, have gone to Eton and Oxford, had gone, in simple fact, nowhere beyond the scanty learning instilled by his sisters and picked up by his reading; he knew no more than any plowboy. But Maurice must have had low tastes and little regard for learning; perhaps, as Mr. Mayne delicately implied, he had been urged in vain to embark on the ordinary course of education, but had gone his own way, which had ended in going to Liverpool to learn to be a mechanical engineer. A Lispenard in a leather apron, toiling in a grimy, oily workshop, with hands such as the Beltons had never imagined could belong to one of good birth! Hands black, rough, ingrained with dust and oil; but in very truth capable hands, which went well with Maurice Lispenard's acute, inventive brain.

Only the boy's sisters knew exactly how he had lowered his pride to entreat his stepfather for the education which was his right. Only they knew the slighting, courtly wave of the hand with which Clarence Mayne had dismissed those appeals as one silences an importunate, spoiled child.

Only they knew that Maurice had gone off to Liverpool to work as an ordinary apprentice because he had no other way of entering any occupation at all, and dared not to live for two years more in th same house with Clarence Mayne.

Nerine breathed more freely since Maurice was gone.

Lispenard House was no place for a lad, set as it was, in a growing town, an island with its huge walled garden in the midst of populous streets. It had once been a country retreat, with a park, of which there was nothing left now but the enormous garden, in the midst of which the old house stood. But the house and garden were of great value, as Clarence Mayne well knew when he paid court to John Lispenard's widow, and it was not till he was safely married to her that he discovered how really immovable the property was tied up.

Mrs. Mayne knew nothing of such things and cared less. She was a Canadian girl, whom John Lispenard had married during that wild, adventurous life of his in the New World. He was an only son and an orphan, with but one blood relation in the world, the Lady Belton, who was Kit's mother. He had left England when he came of age, and for the rest of his life was virtually lost.

All Lady Belton ever heard of him were the presents which now and then reached her from various out-of-the-way-places; a letter or two telling of his marriage and inclosing a photograph of his wife, and then after an interval of some years a letter from his disconsolate widow, mentioning his death in a mining accident in Nova Scotia, as though Lady Belton already knew all about it. The point of the letter was in the postscript of three pages. She was going to be married to Mr. Clarence Mayne, and they and their three dear children, who would now have a second father, were coming to England to live at Lispenard House, which the writer had never yet seen. Would Lady Belton get them respectable maids who would be ready to come to them as soon as they arrived?

Arrive they did in due course. Mrs. Mayne as tall, handsome and unpractical as when John Lispenard had married her; her new husband inexpressibly unobjectionable, with manners which might have been acquired at the court of old France; small and clear cut as to features, with blue eyes which had too cold and direct a gaze for most people to meet. The three children were unmistakable Lispenards, apparently about the ages of five and four. Lady Belton thought them wonderfully well grown for their age, when, at Mrs. Mayne's sudden death about a year after her arrival in England, Mr. Mayne told her they were but four and three, but, then, both their parents had been very tall and robust.

Mrs. Mayne, on her arrival in England, made that will which was so soon to be needed. As the lawyer discussed the matter with her, she discovered how very little she had to leave.

Lispenard House and Lispenard money were all strictly entailed. She left Clarence Mayne his income until the two elder children of her first husband should be of age; then it had to go to the male heir in the direct line, not from any will of John Lispenard, but by that of his father.

When Maurice was old enough to understand his position he vowed to himself that there should be share and share alike between himself and his twin sisters. They should have as much right in Lispenard House as he, and as much money made over to them. If the third was not enough to enable him to live in his father's house as his father's son should, he would have a profession and by it earn a sufficient income.

Kit was the boy's only confident, and she veered between admiration and disgust at his purpose like a weathercock, to which her father's and mother's worldly-wise opinions and her affection for Agatha and Nerine played north and south winds.

She had come across her cousins about two years ago, while staying with some people in the neighborhood, and had been their fast friends ever since.

"Girls," Kit cried, shaking off the thoughtful silence which had fallen upon the three in the big room, where the fire played fitfully from bare floor and scant furniture to vaulted ceiling, "how much money have you? I mean what is the exact amount of your present funds?"

Agatha laughed where she still sat on the hearth rug, her long white hands clasped round the knees of her shabby dress.

"Funds, my dear! Call them riches," she cried. "We have really, truly and absolutely, besides the three sovereigns doled out for our month's support by our beloved stepfather, fifteen pounds."

"Where did you get it?" Kit asked, bluntly, though it was not a particularly large sum to her.

"We made it," Nerine said. What pretty boots Kit had on, and she would burn them in a minute. "Kit, your boots are touching the grate!" warningly.

"Of course! I'm drying them," as the triumphs of the shoemaker's art hissed loudly on the hot bars. "Tell me about the money."

"We have a friend,' said Agatha, mysteriously, "and he gave unto us money for empty words."

"Nonsense!" Nerine's cheeks turned red. "You know we never saw him, nor he us. Kit, we saw an advertisement in the Piccadilly Budget for short stories and we wrote two——"

"And got eight guineas apiece for them!" Agatha broke in, triumphantly. "We spent a pound on some things we wanted, and we've fifteen to maintain us during the next three weeks. How," with a long sigh of pleasure, "shall we ever do it?"

In Kit's pocket were two ten-pound notes, not counting loose gold and silver. Lady Belton had said she was to be sure to buy Agatha and Nerine some trifling present, furs or anything they cared about having. And her money burned in her pocket. But she would wait until she knew what they wanted.

She yawned involuntarily with weariness, and Nerine saw it.

"Agatha it is half past six and we quite forgot in getting the old man off that Kit had had no tea!"

She stooped to the wide hearth, where the grate had been an after thought of economical Mr. Mayne's, and lighted a candle, whose feeble flame brightened slowly and shone on the two Lispenard heads, black and smooth as silk, and on the rioting, curled head of little Kit, like tangled floss of gold.

Kit was pale. She had not, tenderly cultured flower though she was, the strength of the Lispenards, who had grown up like weeds. And she had eaten nothing since morning.

"Take her up-stairs, Agatha, and give her a pair of my shoes," Nerine said. "And we'll have tea at once, so don't be long. The fatted calf"—laughing—"is only a chicken, and cold!"

CHAPTER II.

KIT'S SECRET.

Agatha gathered Kit's costly wraps under one arm and slipped the other round Kit herself, who carried the candle, dropping wax plentifully by the way.

Along the empty baize-covered passages the two passed silently as two ghosts. The great house was strangely quiet to Kit, for there was not a servant nor a light to be seen all through their journey to the room got ready in secrecy for the expected guest.

Big as it was, it was cozy and even cheerful. The old-fashioned chintz hangings of the bed were gay with shiny roses and parrots. The screen between the door and the fire was embroidered with cherry-colored ladies courtesying to blue-and-yellow gentlemen in white wigs. An old-fashioned cheval glass, set in carved flimsy mahogany, reflected the light of the fire, and two candles burned in high silver candlesticks on the chintz-hung toilet table.

It was an enormous contrast to Kit's little silk-curtained nest at home, but she liked it. Who knew, she thought, looking around shyly as Agatha poured out hot water for her travel-weary face into the depths of a priceless basin, if some day she might not have this very room for her very own and live in it always? If——

Kit hid her face in the depths of the basin and sponged away her hot cheeks with the hotter water. She and Maurice Lispenard were only nineteen, and besides——

Kit's heart beat a little faster as she dried her renovated countenance. How much did Agatha know, she wondered, about her and Maurice?

"Kit," cried Agatha, "your skirts are all wet, and we haven't even sent for your boxes," hearing the suspicious swish with which the guest's

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

The COMFORT Sisters' Corner

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

SHAKESPEARE tells us, "neither a borrower nor a lender be;" and while we ordinary mortals would hardly presume to contradict that worthy gentleman, most of us will agree that borrowing and lending have advantages all their own. Not only is it a great convenience to the borrower but it gives the lender a feeling of satisfaction to be able to help a fellow man—or fellow woman since women are supposed to be addicted to the borrowing habit more strongly than men. Who knows, maybe the fair Anne borrowed enough coffee for the immortal William's breakfast (or whatever his favorite morning beverage was) but let us hope she returned it promptly, and that brings me to the real object of this little talk. Whether we believe in borrowing or whether we do not is immaterial in itself but if we do borrow, let's make it a point to "pay back." Particularly with the prevailing high prices it is really dishonest to borrow foodstuffs, even in small quantities, unless they are returned or full value given, though, of course, it is equally dishonest at lower prices, though the loss is not so much.

Aside from articles of that sort, most every household can boast (?) of other things too numerous and varied to mention that have been borrowed and never returned. Chief among these are books and there is nothing more distressing to a lover of books than to loan some cherished copy to a friend who promises faithfully to return it "just as soon as it is read" and then, if it is returned at all, to receive it in a sadly dilapidated condition.

A National Pay Back Day would be a good idea but in the meantime, while we are waiting for it to materialize, let's take an inventory of goods to be returned—and return them.—Ed.

DORCAS, OHIO.

DEAR SISTERS:

Many times I have heard people say that no matter what ailed them they did not want to be taken to a hospital. I don't agree with them for if anyone has a sickness that their home doctor cannot cure and he thinks there would be a chance for their lives by being operated upon and advises going to a hospital, it would be wicked on their part not to try.

Last spring I spent three weeks at a hospital in Columbus, Ohio, and I was treated as nicely as anyone could possibly be. The nurses were very kind. But for one thing I didn't try to see how much bother I could put them to. Some people think that because they are paying a good price for their care they should get their money's worth out of the nurses. There were six women and a little girl in the ward I was in and I feel safe in saying that one of these women was more bother than the rest of us put together. She wanted so much and was so fussy and disagreeable that the nurses did not like to wait on her and then she complained she did not get the care the rest of us got, simply because we treated the nurses as we would want to be treated were we in their place. A nurse has a hard time of it at best and one told me it was a pleasure to wait on patients that were reasonable. Of course all hospitals may not be alike but in this one I was treated fine from the surgeon down and it wasn't because I had money either. They sympathized with the poor, suffering humanity that came there and that was why they pulled me through a serious operation and I feel thankful we have institutions like that where we can be taken care of.

I don't remember ever reading anything on this subject and I thought it might help some suffering sister that dreaded the hospital.

I have read COMFORT since the days of Aunt Minerva and her owls and it will always be a welcome visitor in our home.

If any of the sisters have any good books they don't care for and will send them to me I will return favor with pink dahlia bulbs.

MRS. ALTA BEEGLE.

Mrs. Beegle. A friend of mine who is a trained nurse of several years' experience was calling on me recently and knowing she would be interested I let her read your letter which she was much pleased with, only she felt that you had omitted one important feature of nursing—that a "case" is merely a "case" to a nurse, or, in other words, no matter how disagreeable or provoking a sick person may be, they receive the same good care a more agreeable patient would receive, on the theory that their illness happens to affect them in that particular way and that they are not really responsible for anything they may do or say. That is a very kind and charitable way of looking at it too, and quite the proper way, as all who have been ill will testify.—Ed.

COLUMBUS, N. C.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I wish you would publish a short appeal for me in COMFORT for I am in hopes some of the good sisters will help me get enough subscriptions for a wheel chair for my little daughter, Catherine. She is quite helpless and has never walked or stood alone as she has suffered all her life from spinal weakness. She cannot talk and I have to feed and care for her as I would an infant and now that she is growing so large it makes it hard for me. She delights in getting out in the yard and a wheel chair would enable me to take her out so many times when otherwise she would have to stay in her room alone. I shall do all I can to get subscriptions but we live in a thinly settled neighborhood, five miles from the nearest town so it is impossible for me to get the entire two hundred as I cannot leave her to go any distance to solicit subscriptions. I have cared for her all her life without the aid of a wheel chair or any help save my own arms. We are poor, working people on a small farm and cannot raise the funds to buy one. I trust all who can will help me raise the two hundred subscriptions, for the sake of my dear little one.

Thanking all in advance for any help they may render, An old subscriber,

MRS. SADIE V. BARNES.

BOONE MILL, R. R. 3, Box 104, VA.

DEAR PEOPLE:

I would be so thankful if the COMFORT sisters would help me get a wheel chair for my little son, Roland, who has not walked a step for a year and a half and the doctors say he will never walk again. We live back in the mountains and see very few people and I cannot get away to solicit subscriptions or to do any work to get money to buy him a chair. I will feel so thankful to the sisters for any help they will give my poor little boy. He is fourteen years old.

Your sincere friend, MRS. W. M. CHEWNING.

It is very seldom that we print letters soliciting subscriptions for the wheel-chair applicants, but these two cases are so out of the ordinary that we will make an exception to our general rule. As will be seen, the parents live in thinly settled districts and the mothers are unable to go any distance to get subscribers or even to leave home to earn money to buy a wheel chair for their crippled children. Here is a chance to win their heartfelt gratitude as well as add a few stars to your crown, by sending in as many subscriptions as you possibly can for either, or both, of the children. Send the subscriptions direct to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and mention in your letter the person for whose benefit they are intended. Read the wheel-chair offer in another part of the paper.—Ed.

MO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I think COMFORT is the finest paper ever printed and I don't see how I could go along without it. I am a young wife and mother, just seventeen years young, so you see I get many helpful hints concerning my housekeeping and the care of my little son. I have been married two years to one of the best men that ever lived. I was married at the age of fifteen. Some of you may say it was too young, yes, I know it was, but my mother being dead and my father a poor man, he willingly gave his consent to our marriage as he had known the young man over a year before our marriage and knew him to be hardworking and honest. I have never known what it was to be unhappy since we were married. He is eleven years older than I am. We enjoy teaching our baby to talk. He is just beginning to lisp a few words. My husband and I are both high tempered. Before we were married we came to an understanding with each other that when one was angry the other was to keep still, and we find that it works splendidly and saves us both harsh words and bitter feelings. How many sisters ever try that way? If not, try it once and see how well it works and you will be so delighted with the result that you will try it always. I do not believe in divorce. I believe that when a couple are thinking of marriage they should understand each other and know their bad points as well as the good. So many people rush into matrimony without giving it as much thought as they should. I was taught to regard marriage as God's work and therefore to keep it holy. How many agree with me?

Best wishes to COMFORT sisters, Mrs. Wilkinson and Uncle Charlie. BELL.

Bell. In conjunction with your letter I would like to publish one I received from a dear old man, eighty-one years old, on the training of children, but since I cannot do that I'll do the next best thing and give you his ideas in a condensed form. He protested against the injustice, even cruelty, of allowing babies to learn too many things they must unlearn a little later in life. Baby talk and baby actions are very cunning and we are prone to let them go on in their cute ways till a time comes when the cuteness is worn off and the poor child must be broken of habits which never should have been formed. For instance, the habit of encouraging baby to strike its mother or other people, is one that if persisted in will result in later punishment for the child, even though it is not to blame and if any hands are to be slapped they should be those of the person who taught or permitted the child to form such a habit. Then this "baby-talk" idea deserves a moment's notice and while it may require will power to talk to the "'ittle sweet s'ings" in a sane, rational manner and tone, it is worth while to make the effort. Ask your school teacher what her opinion is. The child who starts in schoolwork hampered by imperfect pronounciation does not make as rapid progress in his studies as does the child whose mother is made of sterner stuff and able to resist so much of nonsense in talking to her children.—Ed.

DETROIT, 342 Jay St., MICH.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have received so many nice letters since my letter was published in COMFORT that I have found courage to write again. I hope this letter, if published, will be as kindly received.

We are not living in Corunna, Mich., now as my husband received a better position in Detroit. I, like Mrs. E. D. Hanna, prefer city life. Living is high in large cities, but there are many advantages as well as disadvantages. Many times one may have a small garden in the back yard which helps wonderfully when one has a thin pocketbook and besides the vegetables are so much nicer than those at the stores. We have always had a garden till this year.

Another advantage is the free libraries. I am a lover of good literature and would not be able to get the good reading I enjoy were it not for the libraries. This summer I have been reading H. Rider Haggard's books and certainly believe there is not another romancer like him. What better reading can one ask for than "Marie," "Allan Quatermain," "King Solomon's Mines" or "The Heart of the World?" I enjoy Sir Walter Scott's and Washington Irving's writings too and many others that, as my letter will be lengthy, I will not mention. Like Ethel Shafer, I have a little book in which I jot down the names of books I read and their authors.

How I wish I might become acquainted with Mrs. A. W. King; no one knows, perhaps I may some day. Strange things occur sometimes. But I do hope she writes again telling more about the Physical Culture she mentioned.

I certainly agree with her on the subject of children's diet. So many, many mothers make a serious mistake by giving their babies solid food before the digestive fluids in the stomach are able to digest it properly and the result is peevishness, sickness at teething time, indigestion and sometimes constipation. Poor babies, how they suffer through the ignorance or carelessness of their respective mothers. No baby should be given solid food till nature tells us the stomach is ready for it which she does by giving the baby from six to eight teeth. Even then if the baby is delicate, or is cutting teeth, or the weather is hot, it is advisable to wait until the baby is a little older. Many baby books say to begin feeding solid food when the baby is a year old that is because a normal baby has from six to eight teeth at that age. The diet after the first year should be as simple as possible although of course there should be some variety in the food. I believe if a good foundation is laid by the use of proper food during the first few years of life, the child will be well prepared in health and digestion for later life. Each child is a law unto himself and anything which is found to disagree should be discontinued and not given again for some time.

Since coming to this crowded city we have not always been able to have a house by ourselves. In the first house was a family with two small children, the younger a baby of eight months. One day when I went into their rooms I saw the baby sitting on the floor eating an apple. The mother proudly told me he ate everything, and I guess he did—everything from turnips to sourcrout. He was having a hard time cutting teeth and as yet had cut none. It made my heart ache to hear the poor baby cry and cry with pain when I knew his mother's carelessness was largely to blame. The next family had had a little girl, but had lost it at thirteen months of age. She told me she had fed her baby everything from the time she was six months old, but admitted the child had been troubled with constipation and had been sick a good share of the time she had been cutting teeth. And I have known of several other cases. Why will mothers who love their children cause so much useless pain!

My baby Ethel is thirteen months old and has never known a sick day. I hardly know when she cuts a tooth except that she is a little cross the day the tooth comes through. Her eleventh tooth has just appeared. On account of the hot summer I have but just weaned her. I began gradually feeding her solid food when she was eleven months old. Now she has four meals a day and eats bread and milk, soft boiled or poached eggs, bread and butter, zwieback, graham and soda crackers, all cooked breakfast foods, beef broth, rice, tapioca, custard and corn-starch puddings, stewed prunes and jello. Her brother Glenn, three years old, is feeding her some bread and milk as I write this. I believe in teaching children to help.

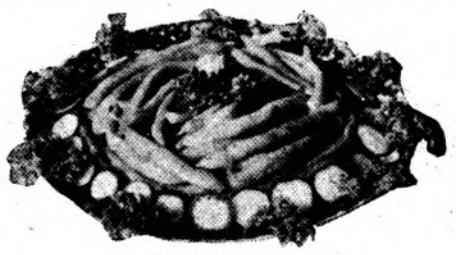
Here is a subject I would like to refer to you sisters. Why is it so many cannot get along with their mothers-in-law? Whose fault is it? Even if there is no active trouble there is often a feeling of animosity between them.

I will close hoping that if this letter is published in time some of the sisters will send me a letter on my twenty-fourth birthday which is January twenty-seventh. And if there are not too many, I will try and answer all. Your COMFORT sister,

MRS. WALTER ALVERSON.

Mrs. Alverson. Thanks for bringing up the subject of "in-laws." I've wondered many times where the fault lay and now, maybe, we'll get some true-to-life experiences that will help both sides.—Ed.

JUNIPER, COLO.



DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a subscriber to COMFORT for years but have never written to the Sisters' Corner, but since reading the letters directed against Mrs. McKnight, and being in sympathy with her views on Woman Suffrage, I must say a few words in her defense. I think Mrs. McKnight's letter to Mrs. Dilly was instigated not through temper or spite as some infer but rather from knowing something of the injustice and suffering in this country and desiring to accomplish with the vote what woman's influence (referred to by Mrs. Dilly) has failed to do.

I wonder it hasn't occurred to Jennie Brooks and others who fear contamination from voting with the women of the red light districts, that with the vote they have the power to eliminate these wholesale markets of the virtue of girls and boys. Do you ever consider the cause as well as the effect? The inmates of the brothels (poor specimens of humanity down to the lowest depths of degradation) were once virtuous girls, the most of them forced there by white slavers. And the men who support these vile institutions of disease and crime (physically and morally unfit to marry and become fathers) were once virtuous boys. No, I say as long as the Government allows the saloons and brothels to degrade and destroy human beings for the revenue (blood and soul money) women not only need but should use the vote.

You ask why women have not made greater progress? Because women and women's interests have been confined within four walls for so long a great many of CALF'S LIVER AND BACON.

OF equal importance in the making and baking of bread is the care of it after it is baked.

Remove loaves at once from pans and place side down on a bread or cake cooler, or whatever is used for a substitute. For a crisp crust allow bread to cool without covering but if a soft crust is desired, cover with a towel while cooling though do not keep bread wrapped in cloth after it is put away as the cloth absorbs moisture and gives an unpleasant taste to the bread. When thoroughly cooled put in a tin box or stone jar and cover closely. The tin or jar should be scalded three times a week in cold weather and every day in summer to prevent molding. Stale bread can be used in so many ways that it behooves the housewife to take care that none is wasted.

MEAT PIES.—Make crust as for any pie. For filling use one pound of leftover meat, cut into small pieces, one half pound fresh pork, cut up, and one onion. Put all together and boil one hour, adding pepper and salt to taste, and water enough to boil. Fill the crusts with the chopped meat, cover and bake in hot oven.

CALF'S LIVER AND BACON.—Fry bacon till crisp, but not hard and take out of fat. Cover liver with boiling water and soak fifteen minutes. Drain and wipe. Cut into strips about half an inch thick. Sprinkle with salt and pepper, roll in flour and fry in the bacon fat. Do not cook liver hard. Five minutes will probably be long enough. Arrange bacon in center of platter with strips of bacon around it and decorate with hominy balls to be served with liver and bacon.

HOMINY BALLS.—Bring to boil one cup of milk and one cup of water and add one half cup of hominy and one half teaspoon of salt and cook in a double boiler one hour. When cool shape in balls, dip in egg and crumbs and fry in deep fat.

SALMON FISH BALLS.—Two cups of minced canned salmon, one cup of mashed potatoes, one half cup of drawn butter, pinch of pepper and one quarter teaspoon of salt. Work in the potatoes with the salmon and moisten with the drawn butter until it is soft enough to mold and keep its shape. Roll the balls in flour or corn-meal and fry quickly to a golden brown in lard or cooking oil. Drain and serve on a hot platter. MISS BESSIE CHRISTENBERRY, Rockwood, Tenn.

SCALLOPED OYSTERS WITH MACARONI.—Break one half package of macaroni into small pieces and cook in boiling salted water one half hour. Drain. Cover the bottom of a baking dish with slices of thinly cut bread, stale preferred, then add a layer of macaroni, a layer of oysters, dot with small pieces of butter and add salt and pepper to taste, and a thin layer of finely rolled cracker crumbs. Proceed in this manner till the dish is filled, having the top layer of crumbs, much thicker than the other layers. Beat one egg into one pint of milk and pour into the dish. Bake half an hour in a moderate oven.

VEGETABLE CUTLETS.—Boil seven large potatoes, mash, add butter, seasoning and enough hot milk to moisten. Chop three small onions and fry in butter. Cook separately ten small carrots and one small turnip. Chop and add with the onion to the potato. Season to taste and cool. Mold into small cutlets, dip in beaten egg and bread crumbs and fry to golden brown in boiling fat.

POTATO CHOWDER.—Peel and cut in dice five good-sized potatoes. Throw into cold water. Cut one quarter pound of ham in shreds and chop a medium-sized onion coarsely. Fry ham and onion together until nicely browned. Drain water from the potatoes and put in a layer of potato dice in the bottom of a stewing kettle, then a sprinkle of the ham, and onion. Then more potato dice, and so on until all is used. Cover with cold water and let come slowly to boiling point. Cook until the potatoes are done enough not to lose their shape. Add a pint of good, rich milk and season to taste with salt and pepper. Rub to a smooth paste two level tablespoons of butter and two of flour. When the chowder boils up, stir in the thickening and continue to stir gently until it boils again. Serve at once.

MRS. WALTER ALVERSON, Detroit, Mich.

POTATO CAKES.—Leftover mashed potato may be utilized for delicious potato cakes. To a cup and a half of potato add one egg and beat the two until light, seasoning to taste. Form into cakes, roll in cracker crumbs and fry in pork f t.

STUFFED POTATOES.—Bake large evenly sized potatoes. Cut off tops and scoop out centers. To six or seven large potatoes add one pint finely chopped cooked meat one tablespoon butter, one cup bread crumbs and seasoning to taste. Refill potatoes and serve while hot.

SAUSAGES WITH APPLE RINGS.—Let sausages simmer in boiling water in a frying pan for fifteen minutes, then drain and fry until brown. Make a syrup of one cup each of sugar and water; core, pare and slice in rings four or five apples, cook rings a few at a time in the syrup until tender, turning often to obtain shape. Serve them with sausages and they make a delicious dish.

MARY H. NORTHEND, Salem, Mass.

DELICIOUS STEW.—One pound stew beef, two pounds of pork chops, two onions. Put in a layer of pork, then a layer of beef and a little onion, season each layer with salt and pepper. Continue until all the meat is used, cover as closely as possible and set in a large boiler of boiling water. Put a cover on the larger boiler, too. Cook three and one half hours.

WALDORF SALAD.—Peel and cut one apple into dice and sprinkle with two tablespoons of orange juice. Add one cup of finely cut celery, one cup of broken walnut meats, one half teaspoon of salt. Mix thoroughly, moisten with one cup of mayonnaise, place in nests of lettuce leaves and garnish with candied cherries.

OYSTER OMELET.—Beat six eggs separately very light; season with pepper and salt; add two tablespoons of cream, and pour into a frying-pan, with a good tablespoon of butter; drop in the omelet eight or ten large oysters, chopped fine, and fry; fold over, and send to table immediately.

PLUM PUDDING.—One cup seeded raisins, one cup currants, one half pound citron, one cup sugar, one cup bread crumbs, one half cup chopped nuts, grated peel one lemon, salt, one half teaspoon allspice, one half teaspoon cloves, one quarter teaspoon nutmeg, three quarters teaspoon cinnamon, one wine glass brandy; mix ingredients, put over top one half pound finely chopped suet; let stand over night; stir, add yolks of four eggs, two cups flour, two teaspoons baking powder, then the beaten whites put in bag wrung out in cold water with plate underneath and steam four hours.

SAUCE.—Two cups brown sugar, one half cup butter; cream and melt in double boiler; stir in one beaten egg; remove from fire and add one cup cream and flavoring.

SQUASH OR PUMPKIN PIE.—One cup squash or pumpkin, sifted, two eggs, one pint milk, stir squash and milk until smooth; set on back of stove to keep warm, add eggs, pinch salt, one half teaspoon cinnamon or nutmeg, one small cup sugar; bake with under crust.

MY MOTHER'S MINCE MEAT.—Two pounds chopped beef, four pounds sour apples, three quarters pound chopped suet, one pound stoned raisins, one quarter pound chopped citron, two and one half pounds sugar, one and one half teaspoons cloves, five teaspoons cinnamon, two teaspoons mace, one half teaspoon black pepper, three tablespoons salt, one pint of cider and vinegar mixed, one pint molasses and the juice of two lemons.

MRS. ANDREW DABOVICH, Virginia, Nevada.

MOLASSES CORN BALLS.—To three quarts of carefully selected kernels, allow one tablespoon of butter, one cup of molasses and one half cup of sugar, with a little salt. Boil until brittle when tried in cold water. Pour this mixture gradually over the corn, taking care that it is evenly distributed. Shape into balls with as little handling as possible.

BREAD PUDDING.—One cup of bread crumbs soaked in one pint of milk. Add two beaten eggs, quarter of a cup of sugar, one eighth teaspoon of soda, one quarter teaspoon of salt, one tablespoon of melted butter and a pinch each of nutmeg and cinnamon. Bake about three quarters of an hour in a moderate oven. Beat the whites of two eggs to a stiff froth and gradually beat in two tablespoons of sugar and drop into small mounds on pudding. Bake to a golden brown and then in the center of each put a cube or ball of jelly.

CRACKER JACK.—Four quarts popped corn, two cups shelled peanuts, one cup molasses, one cup sugar, and butter size of an egg. Boil molasses, sugar and butter until it will spin a thread, then pour over corn and peanuts, mix well and form into any desired shape.

MRS. DAVID LOWE.

FAVORITE CAKE.—Stir together till creamy one half cup butter or lard and one cup of sugar; add two well-beaten eggs. Then alternately one cup of milk and two cups of flour, well sifted with two teaspoons baking powder. Add a pinch of salt and one teaspoon of vanilla. This is one of the best recipes I ever tried.

MOCK CREAM FILLING.—One large sour apple, grated, white of one egg one cup of brown or confectioner's sugar and flavor to taste. Beat steadily for twenty minutes. Can scarcely be told from cream filling.

MRS. C. R. MILLER, Clackamas, R. R. 1, Oregon.

RICE CAKES.—Add enough milk to two cups of cold boiled rice to make quite thin and cook in double boiler till rice is soft, add salt, one beaten egg and enough flour to handle. Spread half an inch thick on pan, mark into squares and bake in hot oven till brown. Butter while hot.

DOUGHNUTS.—One egg, beat thoroughly and add one and one half cup of milk and cream half and half, one and one half cups sugar, one and one half teaspoon baking powder, a little nutmeg and flour enough to make a soft paste. Roll very thin, cut out and fry in hot lard. Dip in sugar.

WHITE DIVINITY CAKE.—Two cups sugar, five tablespoons melted butter, one cup sweet milk, three cups flour, two teaspoons of baking-powder, whites of six eggs and one teaspoon vanilla. Cream butter and sugar, add milk; stir well while adding the flour, into which the baking-powder has been stirred; add flavoring and lastly the eggs beaten very stiff. Bake in layers.

CHOCOLATE CREAM CAKE.—One and three quarters cups of sugar, three cooking spoons of butter, three eggs, one cup of milk, two and one half cups flour, two teaspoons baking-powder and last of all add one quarter pound melted chocolate.

CARAMEL FROSTING.—One cup brown sugar, one half cup thin cream, and one teaspoon butter. Boil until a soft ball can be formed in water. Beat until creamy, add vanilla and spread on cake.

CHOCOLATE FILLING.—Four tablespoons chocolate, melt and let cool; add three tablespoons milk three quarters cup of sugar two teaspoons butter and one egg. Mix well and cook until it thickens. Let cool, flavor and spread on cake.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Edith Allandale, the only support of an invalid mother pawns a valuable watch. To redeem it she offers a five-dollar gold piece, paid to her by Royal Bryant, to the broker, who, dropping it into the drawer declares it a counterfeit and returns it. Going home her mother suggests it may be genuine and again Edith goes out to buy food and coal. While eating supper an officer enters, followed by the grocer who insists upon Edith's arrest for passing counterfeit money. Mrs. Allendale unnerved, faints away, and Edith protesting her innocence, is hurried to the station house, leaving her mother in the care of Kate O'Brien. Edith writes to Royal Bryant explaining the situation.

He redeems the watch, secures Edith's release and sends her home, where she finds her mother dying. After her death in reading letters, Edith learns she is an adopted daughter, the child of a dear friend, who believes she is legally a wife, until the father of her child admits his perfidy and deserts her. Edith writes Mr. Bryant, giving no address and goes to Boston, securing a position as companion with Mrs. Gerald Goddard. Edith discovers there is a skeleton in the family, when Mrs. Goddard accuses her of attempting to steal her husband's affections. Emil Corelli, Mrs. Goddard's brother is persistent in his attentions to Edith; she tries to avoid him and decides to leave. Mrs. Goddard begs her to stay. Edith, going to walk renders assistance to Mrs. Stewart, who is attracted to her and shows agitation when she learns she is a companion to Mrs. Goddard, and if she needs a friend to come to her. Edith is overtaken by Emil Corelli. Nearing Mrs. Goddard's house, a woman, unknown to Edith addresses Emil in a foreign tongue. Realizing that Edith thinks there is something mysterious in his relation to this woman he endeavors to set it right, renews his protestations of love, offers marriage and is staggered by her refusal. Mrs. Goddard unfolds a scheme which cannot fail to make Edith Allen his wife, but Emil must go away. Mrs. Goddard plans with Edith for a "mid-winter frolic."

CHAPTER IX.

THE HOUSEKEEPER AT WYOMING.

THE invitations for the merry-making were at length printed and forwarded to the favored guests, but the family were not to go to Wyoming for a week or so, and meantime, Mrs. Goddard devoutly hoped that the weather would change and send them a fine snow-storm, so that there would be good sleighing during their sojourn in the country.

She had her wish—everything seemed to favor the schemes of this crafty woman, for, three days later, there came a severe storm, which lasted as many more, and when at length the sun shone again there lay on the ground more than a foot of snow on a level, thus giving promise of rare enjoyment upon runners and behind spirited horses and musical bells.

At last the day of their departure arrived, and about ten o'clock, Mrs. Goddard and Edith, well wrapped in furs and robes, were driven over the well-trodden roads, in a handsome sleigh, and behind, a pair of fine horses, toward Middlesex Falls.

It was only about an hour's drive, and upon their arrival they found the Goddards' beautiful country residence in fine order, with blazing fires in several of the rooms.

The housekeeper, Mrs. Weld, had attended to all the details of preparation, and was complimented by both Mr. and Mrs. Goddard. In appearance the housekeeper was very peculiar, very tall and very stout, and in no way graceful in form or feature. Mrs. Goddard voted her as "a perfect fright," with her eyes concealed behind large, dark blue glasses. She had been employed through the agent of an intelligence office, and had come highly recommended. A close observer would have noted many oddities about her; and Edith, coming suddenly upon her in her own apartment, had reason to suspect that the housekeeper was not what she seemed—in fact, that she was disguised.

Noiselessly Mrs. Weld went about her duties, her footfalls dropping as quietly as the snow. On one occasion, arriving unexpectedly within hearing of her master and mistress, she heard him entreating her to give him possession of a certain document. This Mrs. Goddard refused until he had performed some act which, as it was apparent from the conversation, she had long been urging upon him as a duty.

Fearing discovery, Mrs. Weld did not wait to hear more, but silently walked away.

A few busy days succeeded, and then the guests began to arrive at Wyoming. The housekeeper seemed to take a great fancy to Edith, and the latter cheerfully assisted her in many ways.

A theatrical performance, planned by Mrs. Goddard, was one of the amusements arranged for the entertainment of the guests. On the afternoon of the day set for the presentation of the little dramatic episode, a great packing case arrived from the city and was taken directly to madam's room.

A few minutes later, Edith was requested to go to her, and, upon presenting herself at the door of her boudoir, was drawn mysteriously inside, and the door locked.

"Come," said madam, with a curious smile, as she led the way into the chamber beyond, "I want you to assist me in unpacking something."

"Certainly, I shall be very glad to help you," the young girl replied, with cheerful acquiescence.

"It is one of the costumes that is to be worn this evening, and must be handled very carefully."

As Mrs. Goddard spoke, she cut the cords binding the great box, and, lifting the cover, revealed some articles enveloped in quantities of white tissue paper.

"Take it out!" commanded madam, indicating the upper package.

Edith obeyed, and, upon removing the spotless wrappings, a beautiful skirt of white satin, richly trimmed with lace of an exquisite pattern, was revealed.

"Oh, how lovely!" exclaimed the young girl.

Next came the waist, or corsage, which was also a marvel of artistic taste and beauty.

This was laid against the skirt when the costume, thus complete, was a perfect delight to the eye.

"It looks like a bride's dress," Edith observed.

"You are right! It is for the bride who figures in our play tonight," said madam. "This must be the veil, I think," she concluded, lifting a large box from the case, and passing it to her companion.

Edith removed the cover, and uttered an involuntary cry of delight, for before her there lay a great mass of finest tulle, made up into a bridal veil, and surmounted by a coronet of white waxen orange-blossoms.

An examination of two other boxes disclosed a pair of white satin boots, embroidered with pearls, and a pair of long white kid gloves.

"Everything is exquisite, and so complete," murmured Edith, as she laid them all out beside the dress.

"Yes, of course, the bride will be the most conspicuous figure—the cynosure of all eyes, in fact—so she could need to be as complete and perfect as possible," Mrs. Goddard explained, but watching the girl, warily, out of the corners of her eyes.

"Who is going to wear it?" Edith inquired.

Madam's eyes gleamed strangely at the question.

"Miss Kerby takes the part of the heroine of the play," she answered, "whom, by the way, I called Edith, because I like the name so much. I did not think you would mind."

"Oh, no," said the girl, absently. Then, with a little start, she exclaimed, as she lifted something from the box from which the gloves had been taken: "But what is this?"

It was a small half-circle of fine white gauze, edged with a fringe of frosted silver, while a tiny chain of the same material was attached to each end.

"Oh! that is the mask," said Mrs. Goddard.

"The mask?" repeated Edith, surprised.

"Yes; I don't wonder you look astonished, to find such a thing among the outfit of a bride," said madam, with a peculiar little laugh; "but although it is a profound secret to everybody outside the actors, I will explain it to you, as the time is so near. You understand this is a play that I have myself written."

"Yes."

"Well, I have entitled it 'The Masked Bridal,' and it is a very cunningly devised plot, on the part of a pair of lovers whose obdurate parents refuse to allow them to marry," madam explained. "Edith Lancaster is an American girl, and Henri Bernard is a Frenchman. They have a couple of friends whose wedding is set for a certain date, and who plan to help them outwit the parents of Edith and Henri. The scene is, of course, laid in Paris, where everybody knows a marriage must be contracted in church. The friends of the two unfortunate lovers send out their cards, announcing their approaching nuptials, and also the fact that they will both be masked during the ceremony."

"How strange!" Edith murmured.

"Yes, it is both a novel and an extravagant idea," Mrs. Goddard assented; "but, of course, nobody minds that in a play—the more extravagant and unreal, the better it suits the public nowadays. Well, the parents and friends of the couple naturally object to this arrangement, but they finally carry their point. Everything is arranged, and the wedding-day arrives. Only the parents and a few friends are supposed to be present, and, at the appointed hour, the bridal party—consisting of the ushers and four bridesmaids, a maid-of-honor, and the bride, leaning upon her father's arm, proceed slowly to the altar, where they are met by the groom, best man, and clergyman. Then comes the ceremony, which seems just as real as if it were a bona-fide marriage, you know; and when the young couple turn to leave the church, as husband and wife, they remove their masks, and behold! the truth is revealed. There is, of course, great astonishment, and some dismay manifested on the part of the obdurate parents, who are among the invited guests; but the deed is done—it would not do to make a scene or any disturbance in church, and so they are forced to make the best of the affair, and accept the situation."

"But what becomes of the couple who planned all this for their friends?" Edith inquired.

"Oh, they were privately married half an hour earlier, and come in at a rear door just in season to follow the bridal party down the aisle, and join in the wedding-feast at home."

"It is a very strange plot—a very peculiar conception," murmured Edith, musingly.

"Yes, it is very Frenchy, and extremely unique, and will be carried out splendidly, if nothing unforeseen occurs to mar the acting, for the amateurs I have chosen are all very good. But now I must run down to see that everything is all right for the evening, before I dress. By the way," she added, as if the thought had just occurred to her, "I would like you to put on something pretty, and come to help me in the dressing-room during the play. Have you a white dress here?"

"Yes; it is not a very modern one, but it was nice in its day," Edith replied.

"Very well; I shall not mind the cut of it, if it is only white," said madam. "Now I must run. You can ring for some one to take away this rubbish," she concluded, glancing at the boxes and papers that were strewn about the room; then she went quickly out.

Edith obeyed her, and remained until the room was once more in order, after which she went up to her own chamber, where she laid her clothing out upon the bed, in readiness for the evening, and then went down to her dinner, which she always took with the housekeeper before the family meal was served.

Edith found Mrs. Weld looking unusually nice—although she was always a model of neatness in her attire—in a handsome black silk, with folds of soft, creamy lace across her ample breast, while upon her head she wore a fashionable lace cap, adorned with dainty bows of white ribbon.

"Oh! how very nice you are looking," Edith exclaimed, as she entered the room. "What a lovely piece of silk your dress is made of, and your cap is very pretty."

"Thank you, child," the woman responded. "Of course, I had to make a special effort for such an occasion as this."

"If you would only take off your glasses, Mrs. Weld," said the young girl. "Couldn't you, just for this evening?"

"No, indeed, Miss Edith," hastily returned the housekeeper. "With all the extra lights, I should be blinded."

"But you have such lovely eyes——"

"How do you know?" demanded Mrs. Weld.

"Partly by guess—partly by observation," said Edith, laughing. "Let me prove it," she continued, playfully, as she deftly captured the obnoxious spectacles, and then looked mischievously straight into the beautiful but startled orbs thus disclosed.

"Child! child! what are you doing?" exclaimed the woman, as she tried to get possession of her property again. "Pray, give them back to me at once."

But Edith playfully evaded her, and clasped them in her hands behind her.

"I knew it! I knew it!" she cried, in a voice of merry triumph. "They are remarkably beautiful, and no one would ever believe there was anything the matter with them. Oh! I love such eyes as yours, Mrs. Weld—they are such a delicious color—so clear, so soft, and expressive."

And Edith, inspired by a sudden impulse, leaned forward and kissed the woman on the forehead, just between the eyes which she had been so admiring.

Mrs. Weld seemed to be strangely agitated by this affectionate little act.

Tears sprang into her eyes, and her lips quivered with emotion for a moment.

Then she put out her arms and clasped the beautiful girl in a fond embrace, and softly returned her caress.

"You are a lovable little darling—every inch of you," she said, with sudden fervor.

"What a mutual admiration society we have constituted ourselves, Mrs. Weld! But, I am sure, I am very happy to know that there is some one in the world who feels so tenderly toward me."

"No one who knew you could help it, my dear," gently returned the woman, "and I shall always remember you very tenderly, for you have been so kind and helpful to me in many ways since we have been here. I suppose the affairs tonight will wind up the frolic here," she went on, thoughtfully. "You will go your way, I shall go mine, and we may never meet again; but, I shall never forget you Miss Allen——"

"Why, Mrs. Weld! how strangely you appear tonight!" Edith involuntarily interposed. "You do not seem like yourself."

"I know it, child; but the Goddards expect to return to town tomorrow, and I may not have an opportunity to see you again alone," returned the housekeeper, with a strange smile. "I do not want you to forget me, either," she went on, drawing a little box from her pocket, "so I am going to give you a souvenir to take away with you, if you will do me the favor to accept it."

She slipped the tiny box into Edith's hand as she concluded.

More and more surprised, the fair girl opened it, and uttered a low cry of admiration as she beheld its contents. Within, on a bed of spotless cotton, there lay a gold chain of very delicate workmanship, and suspended from it, by the stem, as fresh and green, apparently, as if it had that moment been plucked from its native soil, was a shamrock, in the heart of which there gleamed a small diamond of purest water.

"Why, Mrs. Weld, how beautiful!" exclaimed Edith, "but—but—isn't the gift a little extravagant for me?"

"You are worthy of a stone ten times the size of that," said her companion, smiling; "but, if you mean to imply that I have impoverished myself to purchase it for you, do not fear; for it was a little ornament that I used to wear when I was a girl, so it costs me nothing but the pleasure of giving it to you."

"Thank you, a thousand times!" returned Edith, "and I shall prize it all the more for that very reason. Now, pray pardon me," she added, flushing, as she returned the glasses she had so playfully captured, "I am afraid I was a little rude to remove them without your permission."

"Never mind, dear; you have done no harm," said the housekeeper, as she restored them to their place. "Come, now, we must have our dinner, or I shall be late, and there must be no mistakes tonight, of all times."

When the meal was finished, Mrs. Weld hastened away to attend to her numerous duties, while Edith went slowly up-stairs to dress herself for the evening.

CHAPTER X.

"THE GIRL IS DOOMED!—SHE HAS SEALED HER OWN FATE!"

After her toilet was completed, Edith descended to the second floor.

In the ladies' dressing-rooms, she found everything in the nicest possible order, and then passed on to those allotted to the gentlemen, in one of which she found that the maids had neglected to provide drinking water.

She was upon the point of leaving the room to have the matter attended to, when Mr. Goddard, attired in evening dress, entered.

"Where is Mollie?" he inquired, but with a visible start of surprise, as he noticed Edith's exceeding loveliness.

"I think she is in one of the other rooms," she replied. "Shall I call her for you?"

"Yes, if you please; or——" with a lingering glance of admiration—"perhaps you will help me with these gloves. I find it troublesome to button them."

"Certainly," replied the young girl, but flushing beneath his look, and, taking the silver button-hook from him, she proceeded to perform the simple service for him, but noticed, while doing so, the taint of liquor on his breath.

"Thank you," he said, appreciatively, when the last button was fastened. Then bending lower to look into her eyes, he added, softly: "How lovely you are tonight, Miss Edith!"

She drew herself away from him, with an air of offended dignity, and would have passed from the room had he not placed himself directly in her way, thus cutting off her escape.

"Nay, nay, pretty one; do not be so shy of me," he went on, insinuatingly. "Why have you avoided me of late? We have not had one of our cozy social chats for a long time. Did madam's unreasonable fit of jealousy that day in the library frighten you? Pray, do not mind her—she has always been like that ever since—well, for many years."

"Mr. Goddard! I beg you will cease. I cannot listen to you!" cried Edith. "Let me pass, if you please. I have an order to give one of the housemaids,"

"Tut! tut! little one; the order can wait, and it is not kind of you to fly at me like that. I have been drawn toward you ever since you came into the family, and every day only serves to strengthen the spell that you have been weaving about me. Come now, tell me that you will try to return my fondness for you——"

"Mr. Goddard! what is the meaning of this strange language? You have no right to address me thus; it is an insult to me—a wicked wrong against your wife——"

"My wife!" the man burst forth, mockingly, and with a strangely bitter laugh.

"I do not love her," he said, hoarsely; "she has killed all my affection for her by her infernally variable moods, her jealousy, her vanity, and her inordinate passion for worldly pleasure, to the exclusion of all home responsibilities. Moreover——"

"I must not listen to you! Oh! let me go!"

Before Edith was aware of his intention, he bent his lips close to her face, and whispered something, in swift sentences, that made her shrink from him with a sudden cry of mingled pain and dismay, and cover her ears with her pretty hands.

"I do not believe it!" she panted; "Oh! I cannot believe it. I am sure you do not know what you are saying, Mr. Goddard."

Her words appeared to arouse him to a sense of the fact that he was compromising himself most miserably in her estimation.

"No, I don't suppose you can," he muttered, a half-dazed expression on his face; "and I've no business to be telling you any such things. But, all the same, I am very fond of you, pretty one,

BREAD—SOME GOOD RECIPES FOR SEVERAL KINDS

By Ella Gordon

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"MEASURED by actual nutritive power, there is no other complete ration which, in economy, can compare with bread," says Dr. Wiley, the celebrated food expert. But bread is the "staff of life" only when made digestible and palatable, for no article of diet is so necessary or so influences the health of a family. Bread was one of the earliest foods known to mankind and was made by pounding dry roots, wetting to form a dough and baked in hot ashes.

Now in the day of scientifically prepared grains and ovens that insure a dependable heat for baking, it requires but the mastery of a few elementary principles and ordinary interest and care to become a good bread-maker. Housekeepers who fail in making good bread often think it requires a certain knack which they do not possess, unaware of their own failure to use proper care and materials.

Good bread and milk supplies all the nutritive power required by the human body, and bread is usually the first solid food taken by children and an equally valuable food in old age when the appetite and digestion have become impaired. for the convalescent, nothing takes the place of crisp toast served with hot milk.

Then comes the all-important sandwich for the lunch and dinner box and right here is good bread indispensable.

Simple rules to keep in mind:

Use the same cup for measuring the dry and liquid ingredients.

Sift flour, meal or graham and fill measure with spoon, making cup even full.

Have liquids lukewarm and unless flour is kept in warm place bring that to same temperature so it will not check the process of fermentation.

To one quart of liquid use three quarts of flour for yeast bread.

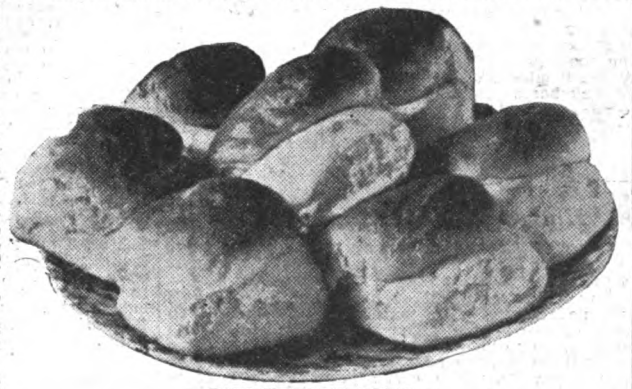
Bread raised over night requires one half yeast cake to one quart of liquid.

Quickly raised bread requires two yeast cakes to one quart of liquid.

Quickly made bread is the best flavored and is accomplished by setting it to rise in the morning, all the ingredients lukewarm and kept so by covering dough and keeping it out of drafts in a moderately warm place. Do not try to hurry the rising as it will make the bread sour and heavy.

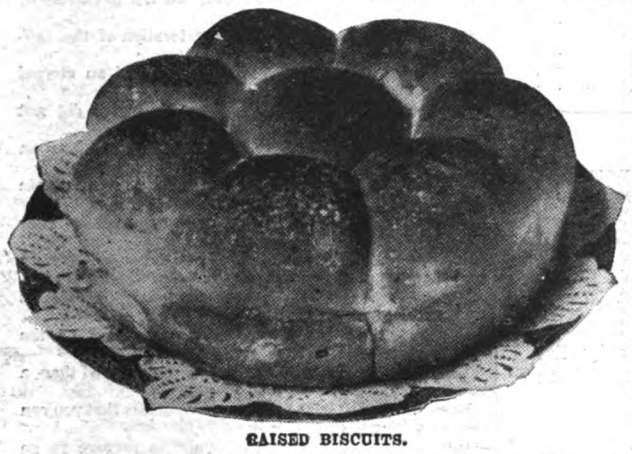
Milk makes richer bread than water and will keep moist longer.

Prevent a crust from forming over the dough by keeping it tightly covered while rising. If a dry crust is worked into dough there will be streaks through the bread.



Dough should rise till double in bulk and then cut down with a wide bladed knife.

The best shortening is butter or lard. Sweeten with granulated sugar. To one quart of liquid use one even tablespoonful of salt.



To knead, dust the board with flour, turn out the well mixed dough and then flour the hands. Draw the dough farthest from you to the center and press with the palms of the hands. Repeat till dough is smooth and elastic with an occasional cutting through and through of the dough. Keep the hands well floured and avoid using more flour than possible on the board.

Fill tins half full, and when raised even full they should be put in the oven to bake. Have the oven sufficiently hot to brown a little flour in one minute for rolls and in five minutes for loaves. Bake loaves one hour. During the first twenty minutes the heat should slightly increase and the loaf rise and begin to brown. Hold the heat steady the next twenty minutes and decrease the last twenty minutes.

On taking bread from oven remove at once from pans and place on a wire sieve on something that will allow the air to circulate freely around it. When about half cool, cover closely with a bread cloth that the crust will be tender.

Recipes

RAW POTATO YEAST.—Much of the success of this recipe depends on having everything ready to do with that the work may be quickly done. Have a kettle of water boiling hard before commencing to make yeast. Use silver spoon. Pare four medium-sized potatoes and cover with cold water. Next mix together one third cup of flour, one third cup of sugar and one tablespoonful of salt in a large mixing bowl. Grate in the potatoes, keeping the potato covered with the flour to prevent turning dark. Add one pint of boiling water, at the same time rinsing the potato from grater by pouring over it. Mix all together very thoroughly and then add in a small stream enough more boiling water to make it the consistency of thin starch. About one quart is usually necessary, depending on size of potatoes. Should the mixture fail to thicken when this amount is added pour into an agate dish and bring to a boil, stirring very frequently to prevent sticking. Strain through a coarse strainer and stir frequently till the mixture is just lukewarm and then add one large cup of yeast three quarters of a compressed yeast cake dissolved in half a cup of lukewarm water. Place a towel over the top of bowl and set in a warm place till foamy, stirring occasionally during this process of rising. When the yeast seems well risen, pour it into glass jars, reserving enough separately for the next yeast making. Keep cool in a dark place, and it is better never to bring the yeast into the hot cookroom, but measure it from the cellar.

WHITE FLOUR BREAD.—In a large mixing bowl put one pint of milk and one pint of water that has first been scalded and cooled till lukewarm. Add two tablespoonfuls of sugar, two tablespoonfuls of warmed butter or lard and two yeast cakes dissolved in one cup of lukewarm water or two cups of yeast. Add three pints of sifted flour and stir till smooth, then add one tablespoonful of salt and three pints more of flour and stir till smooth. If liquid yeast is used a little more flour will be necessary. Turn out on floured bread-board. Knead, rise in a greased bowl, put into tins, bake and cool according to rules in above article. This is a quick method of making bread which brings better results in winter when fermentation is slower. One half the yeast will raise the bread but it will have to set over night. Bread started in the morning and baked in later afternoon is always the best.

RAISED BISCUITS.—Reserve a portion of the white flour bread dough, mold into balls the size of a large English walnut, put well apart in tins, raise till double in size, then brush with white of egg mixed with a little water and bake fifteen minutes in a hot oven, decreasing the heat the last five minutes.

PARKER HOUSE ROLLS.—Scald and cool two cups of milk and add two tablespoonfuls of sugar, four tablespoonfuls of butter or lard, one yeast cake or one cup of liquid yeast and three cups of sifted flour. Beat till very smooth, cover and rise in a warm place which should take about one hour. Cut down and add one teaspoonful of salt and three more cups of flour or possibly a little more and knead well. Let rise again till about double in bulk then roll out thin and brush with melted butter. Cut into rounds with biscuit cutter, make a heavy crease across the center and fold once. Place well apart in a pan, let rise till light and bake in a hot oven fifteen minutes.

GRAHAM MUFFINS.—Mix together one cup of entire wheat or graham flour sifted, one cup of white flour, one half teaspoonful of salt, two tablespoonfuls of sugar and four teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Beat one egg, add one cupful and two tablespoonfuls of milk and two tablespoonfuls of molasses and mix together and stir into the dry ingredients. Lastly beat in three tablespoonfuls of warmed butter. Bake in hot muffin pans twenty minutes or till brown and slightly shrunken around edges.

FRIED BREAD WITH FILLING No. 1.—Beat one egg very light and then beat in one half cup of sugar. Add three quarters of a cup of milk and two cups of flour to which has been added one rounding teaspoonful of baking powder and quarter of a teaspoonful of salt. The batter should be quite stiff and a little more flour may be necessary. Have ready either dried apple sauce or mince meat and to each mixing spoonful add about three teaspoonfuls of filling by putting it onto the batter, covering it with batter, and then taking up the mixing spoonful and dropping into hot, deep fat. Fry till a golden brown. Garnish with jelly.

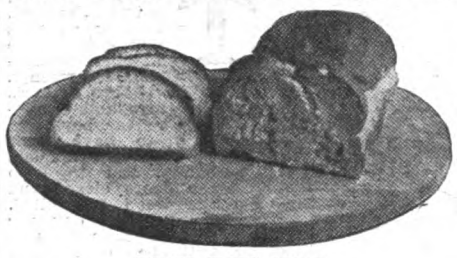
FRIED BREAD WITH FILLING No. 2.—Reserve portion of raised dough and roll about half an inch thick. Cut in rounds, put about three teaspoonfuls of filling onto one half, turn over the other half, pinch edges together and drop into hot, deep fat and fry brown.

The baking specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture have been conducting a series of successful experiments in using boiled potatoes with flour in making bread. It has been found to make as appetizing and as nutritious a product and that the bread keeps fresh longer than when made from all flour.

Potato Bread

Straight Dough Method

The following is one of the methods for making potato bread, worked out in the government baking laboratory, and recommended in a recent bulletin.



For four one-pound loaves, the following ingredients are required:

Three pounds of boiled and peeled potatoes, two and one quarter pounds of good bread flour, three level tablespoonfuls of sugar, one and one half level tablespoonful of salt, two cakes of compressed yeast, four tablespoonfuls of lukewarm water.

Wash thoroughly and boil in their skins about twelve potatoes of medium size. Cook them until they are very tender. Drain, peel and mash them while hot, being careful to leave no lumps. Allow the mashed potato to cool to 86 degrees F. or until lukewarm. To three pounds (five solidly packed one half pint cupfuls) of the mashed potato, add the yeast, which has been rubbed smooth in a cup with three tablespoonfuls of lukewarm water. To get all the yeast, rinse the cup with the remaining tablespoonful of water and add this also to the potato. Next add the salt, the sugar and about four ounces of the flour (one scant half pint of sifted flour). Mix thoroughly with the hand, but do not add any more water at this stage.

Cover the mixing bowl to avoid the formation of a crust on top and place out of the way of drafts to rise, where the temperature cannot fall below 80 degrees F. or be much higher than 88 degrees F. Where the housewife has no thermometer she should see that the dough in all the risings is kept moderately warm, but not up to blood heat. Any water used in mixing the dough should be moderately warm, but by no means hot. This sponge if kept at the proper temperature, should, after two hours, become quite light.

To this well-risen sponge, which now will be found to be quite soft, add the remainder of the flour, kneading thoroughly until a smooth and elastic dough has been formed. The dough must be very stiff, since the boiled potato contains a large amount of water which causes the dough to soften as it rises. Do not add water to the dough unless it is absolutely necessary to work in the flour. Set the dough back to rise again,—temperature at about 86 degrees F.—until it has trebled in volume, which will require another hour or two. Then divide the dough into four approximately equal parts, reserving a tiny lump weighing two or three ounces for an "indicator." Shape the sample into a ball and press it into the bottom of a small tumbler with straight sides. The glass should be slightly warmed. Note the volume of the ball of dough in the tumbler and mark the glass at twice this volume.

Mold the four portions into loaves and place in greased pans which have been slightly warmed. Place the glass containing the "indicator" beside the pans and let all rise, under proper temperature, until the "indicator" shows that it has doubled in volume. Then place the loaves in the oven and bake in a good, steady heat (400 degrees to 425 degrees F.) for 45 minutes.

TO TEST OVEN.—Where no oven thermometer is at hand, a convenient test will be to put a teaspoonful of flour in an earthen dish in the oven. If this flour becomes light brown evenly throughout in five minutes' time, the oven is right for bread baking. If the flour scorches in that time, the oven is too hot them are intellectually unfit for the ballots. They either don't care or vote as they are told and naturally that impedes the progress of those who do know and care.

I am not an extremist. I believe Man was intended by nature to be the leader, Woman to be his companion (not his property), and to walk beside him in progress and not follow behind. In fact to be his mental as well as his soul mate.

I think the home is woman's highest sphere (when she has a home), but not to the exclusion of all outside interests. I think she should know something of what is going on in the outside world and help make it a better place to send her boys and girls when they are grown.

I wish you Anti's who are well housed, well fed and well clothed, who have children and noble husbands, would tell me what you advocate for the thousands of women who have neither homes nor husbands. Women who have to compete with men in making a living. If they can get better laws by which to live and make a living have you any right to say they shouldn't? And in so doing, are you extending to them that Christian spirit to which you profess? Yes, the Anti's have a right to their own opinion, but they have no right to try to deny to others what they themselves do not want or need.

It does seem strange—that the finest and most prominent men and women of the nation are in favor of women voting while so many of the COMFORT sisters are opposed to it. However, I wish more would give their reasons, as I have never yet heard a good one given.

SO. DAKOTA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

This is my second letter to COMFORT and this time I hope Mrs. Wilkinson will be more kind than she was before, for I am seeking advice.

I have been married a little over two years and am twenty years old. My husband is eleven years older than I am. He loves me I know and is always kind and good to me, but still there is something bothering me. I like to go out among people and enjoy myself or as some say, "have a good time," but whenever I suggest going to visit any of our friends my husband always seems inclined to stay at home. In the end he most always goes with me but he never acts as though he were enjoying himself and some of our friends have noticed this also. The only place he seems to be willing to go with me is to see his mother and sister. And although they are good to me and mother is a dear old lady, I feel out of place there as they are of a different nationality and generally speak in their language which I cannot understand or speak.

I don't think he can be ashamed of me, for I am fairly good looking and always try to look my best at all times.

Will some of the sisters please write to this corner and give me their ideas and advice on this matter?

I shall be glad to hear from any who care to write as sometimes I get rather lonesome. I have never lived on a farm before.

I will leave my name with our dear friend and helper, Mrs. Wilkinson, and sign myself, your COMFORT sister, "MRS. PETE."

Mrs. Pete. I'm going to let the sisters settle your difficulty for you. Doubtless some of them will tell you that if you have a husband willing to stay home you should let him. Others will say that if you knew his disinclination for society and was willing to marry him in spite of it, that you should be a good sport and make the best of it. Others will advise you to go alone, and I've even heard some advocate going with men friends of the family, with the husband's knowledge and consent of course. What do the sisters think about it?—Ed.

MO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

May I be permitted to have a few minutes' chat with you while I am in the mood to talk?

This season of the year makes me realize how much is given us to be thankful for. This passing away of another year numbers our deeds with the past. Has the time been well spent? With each word and deed recorded has it been kindness, charity, and love toward our fellow men? It may have been ever so small but like the little pebble dropped in the great river, a little splash, then the ripples and the waves have carried it out on the great body of water. So with our aims and ambitions. To be noble men and women we should create the habit of letting the little pebbles of love and kindness drop where they will be passed on and on till they may become joy and gladness.

The passing of 1916 may have marked the happiest year of our lives, bringing us with full appreciation of our blessings to the beginning of this year. And how shall we spend it? Life is so uncertain that we cannot tell but let us mothers with girls just budding into womanhood, ever pray for them virtue and self respect. Let us try to be the true, tender, affectionate mothers God intended us to be. Let us consider it an honor to find ourselves trusted, chosen to be the guide and counsel of our little ones and appreciate the fact that He thought us worthy to be a mother.

I have long been a reader of COMFORT and have had many hours of pleasure from its pages. Long may it live to carry messages of love, sow seeds of kindness and reap its harvest in a world to come.

With love to all and malice toward none, I am, Your loving sister, A MOTHER.

The Kingdom of Our Birthright

This is the first of a series of twelve lessons on the philosophy of life as taught by those who believe that the stars exercise a potent influence over human destiny, and ascribe to birth-stones a talismanic charm for the protection of those who wear the gems that symbolize their respective birth months.

We are not advocating these beliefs, though they have persisted from remote antiquity and have not a few devotees even in this present age of reason. Yet as myths and superstitions that have dominated through the ages they possess historic interest and educational value. Miss February will appear next month and we trust our readers will be entertained by what she has to say.—EDITOR.

MISS JANUARY.

THIS little maid, Miss January, looking so pert and comfortable in her seasonable garments, brings us New Year's Greetings and a message to the boys and girls to have their ear-laps and mufflers handy, and to keep the doors closed and the wood box filled, for on that day the weather man says it will be cold with high winds.

And when a few kindred spirits have gathered about the warm blaze, how often do the mysteries of the future become the absorbing topic of conversation and are vainly sought for in the tea cup or in the shuffling of the deck!

But there were wise men, hundreds of years ago, who told that our destinies are ruled by the aspect of the planets when we were born, and claimed to read the decrees of Fate recorded in celestial horoscopes.

These Solomons taught that born between the twenty-second day of January and the twenty-first day of February, men are destined to succeed in their ambitions, for genius has marked them for her own. The years of youth will not pass without struggles, for money will be scarce and the burdens of others will fall on the young shoulders. But the skies will clear, and at thirty he is a resolute man, finding the early hardships but taught him to live right.

He will be a great speaker and the country will know him as a man of a highly conscientious nature and very religious.

He may not show good judgment in selecting a wife for he will be much influenced by the opposite sex.

"Woman's affection is best proved
By the care she takes of your linen."

Women whose birthdays occur between the dates mentioned have faithful natures and make loving, devoted wives. They are active, of nervous temperament, and will be liable to diseases of the nervous system. They are natural business women and will succeed.

Personal appearance will greatly concern them, and places of public entertainment and instruction will attract their interest and receive their patronage.

The Magic Influence of the Birthstone —For January 'Tis the Garnet

That a magic influence has been attributed to jewels since the world began is undisputed. We trace all through the Bible references to precious stones, even as early as Gen. ii, 12.

Fact and fancy are strangely interwoven in the value set on some particular gem, which may arise purely from association or from the fact that good fortune attended the years during which some ornament was carried about the person or worn as a jewel.

However this may be, optimism promotes success, and faith and hope bring health and happiness, and sentiment is good for all mankind. The daily sight, or the knowledge that we carry a gem that is dear from association, causes a sentiment that cannot be analyzed. Call it superstition, if we will, but we would not part with it, and we know that it awakens and strengthens the better qualities within us; that it has been a secret personal comfort through life.

There is a very pretty story of the lad who wore a ring of garnets, given him by his father, saying it possessed great power to remove all obstacles that blocked his way to success.

By the time the son reached manhood, his country was defending her shores from the enemy, and his King called him to take many a perilous journey that might cost him his life.

But he wore his ring of garnets either on his finger or suspended about his neck, and his faith in his father's gift and prophecy kept his brain clear, and his hand steady through many an hour of peril, to return to his ruler and hear his words "well done."

And thus has come about many a custom wherein gems have played an endearing part because of association and tradition, and one of the most popular of the times is the Birthday Stone, symbolic of the month in which the wearer was born.

Those born in January should wear the garnet, symbolic of power, "the guardian of all right; it makes those on whom it acts, free; it is mightiest when most gentle—mere force must fall before it."

How to Make a Miss January

Some of COMFORT'S young people may want to make a Miss January, so here is the way it is done.

Buy a ten-cent doll or make a head of cloth and paint face with water colors. Fasten to neck of bottle the right height and fill bottle with sand or earth to make it heavy. Make arms and fill with hayseed. Make a plaited skirt of pale green or white crepe paper. The coat is made of red crepe paper and chould come half way over the skirt. Use the red for crown of hood and trim with white cotton; also make the muffler, mittens and muff (all the M's) of cotton. Speck it with bits of black ink to represent ermine.

SPRINGFIELD, 5 West Main Street, OHIO.

MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Please allow a silent sister, one of the so-called uncivilized race, a Japanese, a few words.

I am Irish, but born in Japan of Missionary parents, raised in Japan, and married to a Japanese in Japan, but for the last few years of U. S.

I have three very sweet babies, and you can laugh if you want to, for they are to me the sweetest babies in the world.

If this letter is printed, I may come again and tell you some interesting things of my country people, and I am sure that if you ever were in Japan you would think as all do who have been there, and that is that it is a most wonderful country.

And very civilized also, and far more modesty in that country than here, and that counts in the civilization part. I am not trying to say U. S. is not civilized, but I do say that U. S. is far behind when it comes to modest women and girls.

To Miss Jessie Rose. I am glad to hear that you wish to become a nurse and I admire your "pluck" and I wish you all success. If you will go to a good hospital, explain your case, you will find them glad to help you, but dearie, you will have to get all your pluck together, and keep it too. It will be hard the first two years, but after the first two years you can get a good salary, and your third year will graduate you, if you are sincere and keep a stiff lip. Always remember to speak gently even if you have a very cross patient. You can enter a hospital, not necessary to have so very much education. They take girls in on a three years' term. The first year the salary is very low, and the work hard and as this is the starter's hardest year, you must keep firm to win and not get discouraged.

The second year is better, and you are more with the patients, and so learn more the second year than the first, and the salary is some better also, and the third year, if you have been a good, studious girl, will be your triumph, and then you can demand fine wages. Of course you always get your board and room from the start. So good luck dearies, and let me know once in a while how you are getting along, and watch the nurses' ways, and especially their conversation, and you take notice of all, in fact be especially observing, all the time and remember all you hear and see, and do it, and no one will know whether you went through high school or not, and you do not have to tell the nurses all about yourself, even though they do ask, so again good luck.

I had a birthday the 24th of November.

My little girl, aged four years, can wash all the dishes, and I scald them and she wipes them and puts all away in their place as good as I can do it. She is a great help to me, and I believe it right to teach the little ones how to work, and clean, and be neat and obedient. They love their bath, and want it every night.

Mrs. Ida Bell Aldridge, that is a beautiful little prayer, and I am very sorry that your child will not say it; all my babies say theirs as soon as they get their nighties on, without me telling them to. I am indeed sorry but please do not whip, or force him to say them; it is more example he needs; try to point out all the nice things, and the kindnesses to him as all coming from God. Tell him pretty stories, similar to fairy tales, every moment you have to spare, only let it be about some child afflicted in some way or miserably poor, and hungry, and how God, as a fairy, aided them. When he wants a new toy tell him you cannot spare the money, but that if he will pray to God, and be good that God will send money enough in some way to buy the toy, and in this way you will keep his heart thinking over the fairy stories, and win his heart in the way you want it, but when you say you have not money to buy, stick to it and don't buy until he prays in faith then keep your promise and get it if you have to go without a meal. Do not promise and deceive him.

Thanking you all for the many helps you have given me in the past, I am with sincere wishes for eternal friendship. MRS. TONY KOGA.

Mrs. Tony Koga. We stay-at-home sisters are looking forward to a long letter from you telling us a lot of interesting things about your life in the land of cherry blossoms and about your babies too. Indeed we won't laugh at them for we know they are all you think them to be.—Ed.

PAYSON'S INDELIBLE INK

ready for use with a common pen. It makes a clear mark and will not spread or wash out and will protect cotton, linens and heavier fabrics from confusion or loss. A household necessity for eighty-two years. Stationers and Druggists sell it in the old-fashioned red and yellow wrappers, or it will be sent prepaid for 25 cents by R. L. Williston, Northampton, Mass., Dept. C.

February Comfort

will be our big Washington, Lincoln and Valentine number with a raft of wit and wisdom, a lot of bright stories and a variety of entertaining, amusing and instructive matter.

Some Special Features for February

"My Lady O'Crinoline" A charming romance of the Civil War, telling how a soldier boy won a sweetheart at a Valentine party of the enemy.	"Unique Mementoes of Washington" that give an intimate view of his private life and habits. These curious relics of priceless value are pictured and described.
"A Valentine Luncheon" telling how to entertain your friends enjoyably and how to prepare and serve the refreshments most attractively.	"Useful Valentines That Children Can Make" shows the children how to make pretty and useful valentines better than shop-made goods.
"Illustrated Lincoln Stories" A lot of jokes and amusing short stories that show Lincoln's wonderful wit, wisdom and kindness.	"The Wrong Way Out" A fine story that teaches what is a woman's due. If all would learn the lesson there would be less unhappy homes.

Crumbs of Comfort

Worry is rust upon the blade.

Every misery one misses is a new blessing.

The most zealous are not always the wisest.

By persuading others we convince ourselves.

Worth makes the man and want of it the fellow.

What a man can do well is his greatest ornament.

The world is his who can see through its pretension.

The society of women is the element of good manners.

A very small bit of religion will make a good-sized cloak.

We may despise the world, but we can not do without it.

Books are a guide to youth and an entertainment to age.

If men are so wicked with religion, what would they be without it?

A pure mind in a fair body is indeed a fine picture in a good light.

To praise justly is to pay an honest debt; to flatter is merely a gift.

A house without family worship has neither foundation nor covering.

Being quick to condemn faults in others is no sign of being faultless.

Slander spreads like an oil-spot; we try to cleanse it, but the mark remains.

The respect of others is the first restoration of the self-respect a man has lost.

Foundations which must bear the weight of an eternal life must be surely laid.

When the Lord endowed man with brains He did not intend to guarantee them.

You can make money much easier with health, than you can make health with money.

It is somewhat remarkable that when a man is a brute he is the most vicious of all brutes.

The two things one never should be angry with are what he can help and what he can't help.

We have been put into the world, we know not why; we are taken out of it, knowing no more.

We should be as careful of our words as of our actions and as far from speaking ill as doing ill.

God made the lilies and God made man, both on the same broad principle of free and natural life.

There are few wild beasts more to be dreaded than a talkative person with nothing to talk about.

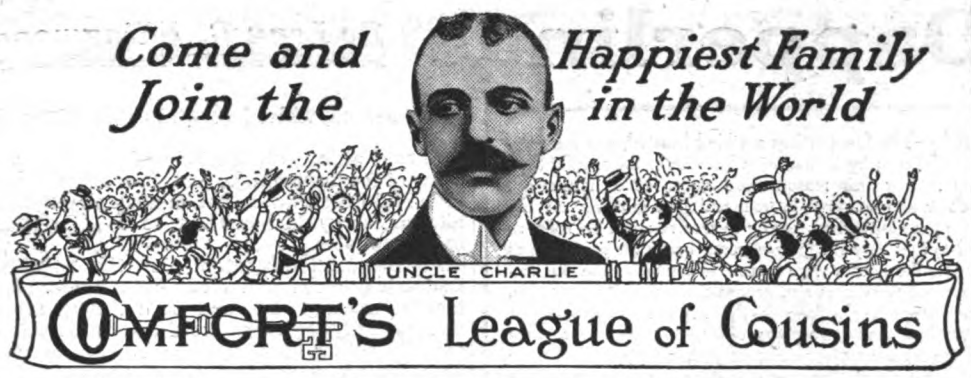
Keep yourself so busy with your own affairs that you can not spare time to meddle with other people's.

Why we are in the world at all is not to prepare to go out of it some day, but to serve God in it now.

Young men are apt to think themselves wise enough, as drunken men are apt to think themselves sober enough.

Keep in the midst of life. Be among people and among things and among troubles and difficulties and obstacles.

The superfluous blossoms on a fruit tree are meant to symbolize the large way God loves to do pleasant things.



Whoever lends an easy and believing ear to slander is of very bad morals, or has no more sense and judgment than a child.

The act of divine worship is the inestimable privilege of man, the only created being who bows in humility and adoration.

We should never be ashamed to own we are in the wrong because it shows that we are wiser today than we were yesterday.

Give bread to a stranger in the name of the universal brotherhood which binds all mankind under the common father of nature.

Never let us think evil of those who do not see as we do, but let us pity them and take them by the hand and spend time and thought over them trying to lead them to the true light.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR to you all. Hop up onto my lap, for I want to have a real heart-to-heart talk with you all about the big things of life, things that vitally concern everyone of you.

Last year I hammered away for months on the subject of preparedness and Americanism. I told you what was expected of you as citizens of the greatest republic on earth, tried to inject some real patriotism into your sluggish souls, tried to make you understand that you are living in the most tremendous period of the world's history, tried to make you realize that that terrific conflict in Europe, which President Wilson, at the beginning of the war told you did not concern us, does concern us just as vitally as it does those nations who are engaged in it. Remember that your future and the future of America, as well as the future of England and Germany, France, Austria and Russia, in fact the future of the whole human race is being decided right now on the bloody fields of Europe. Nearly a score of nations have been plunged into the fiery crucible of war, and from that molten furnace of hell, hate, ambition and lust, will emerge a new world. It may be a better world, it may be a worse world. That all depends whether democracy wins, or autocracy triumphs, whether the people are to be on top, or divine right monarchs are still to control and hold in the hollow of their hands the lives of millions of unfortunates. Whatever happens, when the time comes we have got to be ready to battle for the cause that needs assistance, and the wrong that needs resistance, and the time may come any moment, and we must be ready to quit ourselves like men, to play our part nobly and well. This is the most tremendous moment in the history of man on this planet, and I want you all to realize the deep significance of that fact, and all it means to you and every living creature.

There is a foolish idea purposely spread by peace for profit papers to fool the Henry Dubbs, that when this war comes to an end, the old world will be a broken reed, morally, spiritually, financially and physically. While this war has been one of devastation, it has also been one of regeneration. The barriers of caste and class have crumbled to dust and greed and selfishness have been replaced by sacrifice, devotion and heroic service. The Central powers are losing nearly a million men a year, but every year eight hundred thousand youths come to military age. The population of Russia increases by leaps and bounds. Three million souls have been born into that country since the war started. It is the same with all other countries. Nature makes up the ravages of war with an unstinting hand, and science sends ninety per cent of the wounded back to the firing line again.

During this great war Europe has been growing thin, while we have been accumulating fat. But Europe has not been destroying herself or plunging to ruin. Instead she has been shedding the superfluous flesh of luxury, idleness, pleasure and high living, until today she stands like a trained athlete, ready for industrial or military war, mobilized and organized to the last man, woman and child. While Europe has been growing vigorous and strong, acquiring youth and virility, America has been growing weak, decadent, luxurious and wasteful, until at last conditions have been reversed, and the old world has become the new world, while the new world has become the old. Since the war began we have become a creditor instead of a debtor nation. Once we were always in Europe's debt, now Europe is in our debt. Two and a half billion dollars, much of it in gold has come to these shores during the last two years, and yet we have sent but thirty-five million dollars—a mere beggarly pittance—to help those European countries devastated and made helpless by the ravages of war. The giving as usual has been left to a few, the vast masses of the people have done nothing, though millions have died and are dying in Europe right now, dying for us, dying so that we may be free and that government of, for, and by the people shall not perish from the earth.

Europe has found her soul, we, alas! have not yet found ours. Before the war is over more than half the gold supply of the entire earth will have found its way to these United States. There is not a country in the world that has any particular love for us and by many nations we are hated and despised. The fatter and richer we grow the more liable to attack we become. Envy and hate can soon forge an excuse to vent their violence. Then too our very weakness from a military point of view is an open invitation to attack.

We have been, and are still living in a fool's paradise. We have had preparedness parades that have simply staggered the imagination, but there was not an atom of sincerity or real patriotism among those who marched in them. We have had flags, banners, brass bands, fireworks, and patriotic, spread eagle speeches, that cracked both eyes and ears. Millions have been willing to march for their country but enlist and fight for it—never. We will do the marching, but the other fellow must do the fighting, has been the craven cry from East to West. It's another case of "Let George do it," and George has gotten tired of being kicked around, and simply refuses to do it until he has a stake in his country, gets a square deal and has something to fight for. Under the shadow or our great Capitol at Washington, passed a preparedness parade of fifty thousand people. The following day recruiting stations were opened, and a hundred officers and men were up at sunrise looking for business. They expected that wonderful patriotic outburst would bring at least a thousand recruits, but their combined efforts after fourteen hours of hard work produced but one man and he wasn't a resident of Washington. Captain MacGonigal in charge of the recruiting stations fired with indignation and disgust, wrote to the Washington Herald next day and said: "Patriotism! I'm beginning to think this town hasn't any. Plenty of people come in here and talk to me all day long, but they don't enlist, instead they give me a nice long lecture on the curse of war, and wind up by telling me I ought to be ashamed of myself for coming down here and trying to lure the young men off to be food for cannon. Thus far I've stood for it and kept my temper, but my patience has been strained to the breaking point."

One recruit out of fifty thousand preparedness paraders! So much for our patriotism, once our greatest asset, our pride and glory and now something that has ceased to exist. Our people do not realize that no country is worthy of self government or can long retain self government unless it is ready and willing to defend that government.

There must be a cause for this apathy and there is. The vast masses of the people are not satisfied with the way this country has been and is being run, and well may they be dissatisfied for it is always run more or less in the interests of the few while the needs of the many are forgotten. Then too any program of preparedness and of national security in time of war that is not superimposed on a foundation of social and economic security in time of peace, is false to the needs of a nation's life. What this country needs is constructive statesmen, statesmen who will deal with the humanities as well as with business. But, alas! it is overrun with hordes of destructive politicians. Before you can expect people to become patriotic you must give them something to be patriotic about, a country must be worth living in to be worth dying for. We have such a country and we create enormous wealth, but it goes into too few hands, and though we live in a glorious land endowed by nature with inexhaustible riches, and though wages and living standards here are higher than in nearly any country on earth, life is not what it should be for many of our people.

America today is not a nation. It is a mere hodge podge of forty-eight loosely jointed states, nearly all of these states are in the hands of political rings whose sole idea is to fatten at public expense. Most of these states too, have conflicting and radically different sets of laws and are inhabited by millions of people, whose hearts, souls and sympathies are with the monarchical countries of Europe, and millions more who care for it only for what they can get out of it, and who think they have a right to extract the last gallon of oil, the last ton of coal, the last ounce of copper, the last nugget of gold, and sweep from its surface the last stick of timber and the last grain of wheat without giving to the state one hour of service or one atom of devotion. These latter are the hogs of creation, drunk with materialism, soused with profit, and mad with power, and the worst of it is we have millions more among us who envy this type of human hog and though they curse him and the country that produced him, would act exactly as he does if they had the opportunity. It was Cromwell who welded the British nation into one strong articulate whole. It was Bismarck who took the scores of little German states and made them into the mighty empire whose power and efficiency enables it to defy almost the whole world. Germany was poor and poverty-stricken; in half a century of organization, cooperation and social legislation she became the wonder of the world.

Today we have the richest country on the face of the earth, but thanks to bad management, stupidity, folly, lack of vision, ideals and patriotism, our country is but a weak, flabby, inefficient, disjointed, backward looking, unwieldly thing. Not until our forty-eight states are knit together in one harmonious whole, not until national organization, a more equitable distribution of wealth, a higher, broader and more practical and rational form of education, rekindle our ideals and deepen our spiritual life, shall we have a United States that is really and truly united. We must build a nation. We have the foundation, we have the material, but we lack the vision and the spirit. Europe has been reborn in two years, we too would be reborn in the same period, if the red hand of war were chastening and purifying us, as it is the peoples of the old world.

We however, do not want war, though I believe as was set forth in the pastoral letter of the Protestant Episcopal Church recently, that God hates a godless and empty peace as much as He hates an unrighteous war, and our peace is godless, for it is a mere cloak that covers an industrial war that is at times as relentless as that which is now taking place in the old world.

Again what is wrong with America? Anyone who has the soul of a flea and the vision of a bat, must know what ails us is the lack of social justice and the need of social legislation to smooth out the festering sores in our social and political life and to narrow the awful chasm that exists between the haves and the have nots, the rich and the poor. One or two sessions of Congress could bring harmony into our national life and relieve millions of homes from the ever pressing fear of want, unemployment and sickness. Why does not Congress take action? It is common knowledge that two per cent of the people own sixty per cent of the nation's wealth, 35 per cent of the people own 33 per cent of the wealth, while 65 per cent of the people own but five per cent of the nation's wealth. Those figures come from one of our government's own commissions. We spend six billion dollars annually for institutions to take care of the derelicts of society. We have nearly three million children who have no schooling. One eighth of our babies do not live to complete the first year of their lives. Our state institutions are simply loaded down with the feeble-minded, criminal, insane and degenerate. Tens of thousands are killed or injured in industries who might be saved to the nation by care and safety appliances. Ninety per cent of our immigrants are allowed to go to the city while vast stretches of land lie uncultivated. During the winter tens of thousands of unemployed throng our cities. Annually in the United States there are 600,000 deaths which might be prevented if existing knowledge of hygiene were properly applied. At least half of the three million and more sick beds which are constantly filled in the United States are unnecessary. The financial loss from earnings by those cut off from preventable diseases or premature death, amounts to $1,500,000,000 annually, and over fifteen years are lost to the average life through the lack of application and knowledge which already exists, but which simply has not yet been disseminated and applied.

Only fourteen in a hundred of this nation's children ever enter the first year of high school, only one hundred and ten in a thousand ever finish the fourth year of the high school course. We are spending hundreds of millions for military preparedness, and we are wise to do it, and must do it, but most of that money will be wasted unless social preparedness and military preparedness go hand in hand.

Let Congress take notice, appoint a Minister of Welfare, gather together the brainiest and big-

The Doings of The Dapperlings

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1916, by Lena B. Ellingwood.
(All rights reserved.)

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.—The Dapperlings are kind-hearted, gay little elf-like beings who ride on rabbits and never let themselves be seen by human eyes because of their belief that, if seen, it would bring some terrible calamity upon them. For this reason their queer little houses are always built into the hillside, and are so made, with doors and windows in front and grass growing on the backs, that they can be turned around to face out when the Dapperlings are by themselves; but as soon as anybody comes in sight the houses are whirled around so that only the grass-covered backs are seen and, as these look like the rest of the hill, you would never know the houses were there. They also have an underground assembly hall with an opening in the top covered with moss and concealed in a clump of thistles.

Down by the mill brook in the meadow near the Dapperling village is the favorite playground of five-year-old Simmie-Sammie Smith and his sister Pittysing, nearly two years older, but, of course, they don't know anything about the Dapperlings. Nattie, the Smallest Dapperling of All, is not afraid of these children. She would play with them if the Dapperling rules permitted, and she does meddle with their playthings slyly and unseen, much to their bewilderment. She takes Pittysing's doll and embroidery scissors, when she isn't looking, and carries them to the assembly hall to show to the other Dapperlings. Later, Pittysing stumbles into the opening through the top of the assembly hall and finds her lost doll decked in a wonderful Dapperling dress which she believes to be the work of fairies.

CHAPTER IV.

CHIPPIE CHATTER

"NATTIE, Nattie, come! We're almost ready to start."

The Smallest Dapperling of All didn't want to get down. Dapperlings' beds are hung from the ceiling, on springs, so you see they get DOWN, instead of getting UP, as we do. If you never slept in a Dapperling bed, and I don't suppose you ever did, you have no idea how warm, and soft, and cozy a bed can be.

Nattie was still sleepy when she came to the door, but once outside, she was wide awake enough.

It was a lively scene. How astonished Pittysing and Simmie-Sammie would have been if they had seen it! The early morning air was fresh and keen. The stars were twinkling gaily at one another, and the moon, just a mere scrap of it left, was still in the eastern sky.

The Dapperlings were out in full force, calling out happy greetings, and at the foot of the hill, all saddled and bridled, and anxious to be off were the rabbits.

At last all the Dapperlings were mounted, and away they went. The rabbits were feeling frisky, and leaped and bounded along, up the hill, through the woods, away and away, while the moon and stars faded and the eastern sky grew rosy. By and by the great, round, shining, beautiful sun came up above the mountain. Then the mists cleared away, the air grew warmer, and it was broad day.

On a distant hillside, miles away, was another Dapperling village, and at the foot of the hill our Dapperlings got off their rabbits to make a call on their friends.

They had a fine visit, and wandered around, looking over the place, laughing and talking sociably.

Nattie, with another little Dapperling, was looking for strawberries, when they heard a queer little sound, something like a cough, something like a sob. They started to run, but Nattie said, "We're not 'fraid-cats, let's find out what the trouble is."

Then the other little Dapperling said, "Oh, it must be something caught in one of the snares." And, sure enough, it was.

A snare had been made by tying a horse-hair noose to a little bush, which was bent over and fastened down by a tiny twig stuck into the ground. Behind the noose had been placed some beechnuts.

A little squirrel had spied the nuts, foolishly run his head through the noose, when up went the little bush, and he was caught fast. He turned his bright eyes upon the Dapperlings and tried to scold at them, but the noose was too tight around his neck.

All of a sudden, Nattie made a beautiful plan.

"Who set the snare?" she asked. Then, without waiting for an answer, she went on, "Oh, do you s'pose they'd give that squirrel to me? I want him dreadfully, for a very special purpose."

When she had heard all about Nattie's plan, the other little Dapperling said, "I'll help you coax for him. I'm sure they'll give him to you."

So they ran back and told the others about the squirrel, and what Nattie wanted of him.

They all thought it a very nice plan, indeed, and said she might have him. But the next question was, how to get him home?

Then old Shandle-Spinx, who was really kind-hearted, though you never would have guessed it to look at his face, said, "I'll manage that. I'll tie his feet together and take him up in front of me, on my rabbit's back."

Nattie clapped her hands for joy, and wished they would start for home that minute, though she was too polite to say so.

THE RABBITS WERE FEELING FRISKY AND LEAPED AND BOUNDED ALONG.

They had dinner first, a picnic dinner, which they ate sitting in the shade of some tall, green ferns, while the rabbits nibbled away at fresh clover-tops.

After dinner was over, they saddled their rabbits, said good by to their friends, and set out on their long ride home.

Nattie was so interested in her squirrel she kept turning around to watch him, and fell off her rabbit twice. If he hadn't been the tamest, quietest rabbit of them all, he would certainly have run away, and left her to get home as best she could.

Old Shandle-Spinx had plenty of trouble, for the squirrel never had gone riding on a rabbit's back before, and he didn't like it. And he never had had his feet tied together before, and he didn't like that! So he squirmed and twisted, and used every one of his strong little muscles trying to get away.

When they got home, the squirrel was shut into the assembly hall, with some water and plenty of food, where he stayed until next morning.

Then Nattie, with the help of Zipzang, another of the Dapperlings, took him down to the little Mill Brook, where the children played, and hitched him by the horse-hair to a leg of the barrel-top table.

For this was the beautiful plan the Smallest Dapperling of All had made—she would give him to Pittysing. She had been feeling sorry for poor Pittysing ever since she got into trouble over the doll and the scissors. You see, it was all Nattie's fault, so she felt that she ought to do Pittysing a kindness, to make up for it. And what would a little girl be likely to enjoy more than to have a live, bright-eyed little squirrel for a pet?

Nattie put a little pile of beechnuts under the table, to keep the squirrel contented. Then Nattie and Zipzang hid behind a bush and waited for the children to come. And what do you think happened?

Sly old Cattie Puss, with her shining green eyes, saw that squirrel, and came creeping, creeping along so still that she was almost ready to spring upon him before the Dapperlings saw her at all.

Well, it wasn't any harm to let a CAT see them, and after all the trouble they'd had getting the squirrel to give Pittysing, they were not going to stand quietly by and see Cattie Puss gobble him up—no, indeed! So they both rushed out from behind the bush, and screaming as loud as ever they could:

"Woo!" "Boo!" "Shoo!"

And Zipzang flourished a little stick right in front of those big green eyes.

Cattie Puss was so scared she forgot all about the squirrel. She turned and ran, and didn't even stop when she got home, but ran right on past the house over to Grandma Brown's, where the door stood open. There she sneaked in, ran up the back stairs, and hid under Grandma Brown's bed.

Pittysing and Simmie-Sammie had been helping their mother that morning, washing the dishes while she made strawberry preserves.

Simmie-Sammie had only broken one saucer, and that was a cracked one, so it didn't count, and after Pittysing had rinsed the dish towels and spread them on the grass to dry, their mother gave them some cookies and a dish of the strawberry preserves.

"We'll play we're travelers going across a big desert," said Pittysing, "and the Mill Brook will be a spring of water in a—a—oh, I don't remember what they call it but in a green place—and we'll eat our lunch there. Where's Cattie Puss? She can be a yellow camel."

They couldn't find Cattie Puss, so they crossed the desert without any camel. When at last Nattie saw them coming, it seemed to her she had never seen them walk so slowly before.

"Hush!" warned Pittysing. "Simmie-Sammie Smith! There's a little squirrel right under our table! Keep still's you can. I'm going to give him some cookie crumbs."

"He's tied!" cried Simmie-Sammie. "See? He can't get away. Oh, Pitts, I'm going to put him in that old bird cage up stairs, an' keep him always."

"He's mine, for I saw him first," Pittysing reminded him. She pulled off her apron, threw it over the squirrel, broke the horse-hair that held him, and picking him up, wrapped in the apron, started for home. Simmie-Sammie ran along beside her, holding her dress.

"It AIN'T yours!" he sobbed. "You've got a cat, an' a piano, an' a doll—two dolls! An' I ain't got nuffin!"

"Why, you've got a rocking-horse, and a hen, and a Teddy Bear—oh, lots of things! But never mind. Don't you cry, and Chippie Chatter'll be OURS! That's what's going to be his name—Chippie Chatter!"

The Dapperling story for next month tells how Nattie is seen by Pittysing and what happens.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

Some years ago I entered one of the large New York hospitals to study nursing. In one of the wards, very sick and poor, lay Uncle Charlie, wracked with pain but enduring his suffering uncomplainingly. Friendless, penniless, always cheerful, he held close to his idea of making this world a happier and more livable place. At that time I little thought to see his dream materialize, but he has "followed the gleam" and succeeded.

When he entered the hospital he entered a home for incurables. Wretched as I thought him in the hospital, his suffering and privation there were even more intense but he worked unceasingly and hopefully until he secured a start. Then came the day when he was able to establish his little flat, a hen coop in very truth and for which rent must be earned every month and the poor, sick body so seldom able to bear the strain. But Uncle Charlie's efforts have drained his strength, though the will to go on is still strong within him. But should what little strength he has give way he might be forced to spend his remaining days in a hospital. Not a bright prospect and not one of us but what wish Uncle Charlie better fortune than that and we mean to keep up the good work till the better fortune proves true.

I have been deeply interested from the start in this Home Fund, for I know so very well how much it is needed and how deeply it will be appreciated.

LYDIA E. LASKOWSKI.

Miss Laskowski. Uncle Charlie will be surprised and delighted when he reads your splendid letter and I hope it will serve to keep up the interest in behalf of his Home Fund, which, as you say, means so much to him—Ed.

BOONEVILLE, ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Since my letter appeared in October COMFORT I have received more than a hundred letters and all of them bright and comforting. They were a great pleasure indeed.

How I would like to answer all but I cannot so am writing to all of you through dear old COMFORT. Several sent stamps for replies and I answered a few but I am too weak and nervous to write much. All of you who sent money, please accept my sincere thanks, for it came just in a time of need as the first of October I came here to the State Sanatorium and needed so many things. I have gained one and one quarter pounds in three weeks, since I came here. Booneville is in the extreme western part of the state and the sanatorium is five miles out from Booneville, among the pines.

Dear sisters, your kind letters did me more good than I can express and God will hear all your earnest prayers in my behalf. I just imagined all those appeals going up to His throne at once and my heart was filled with the sweetest peace and contentment.

Some of the letters I received were urging me to try Christian Science, some Divine Healing and others sent recipes for remedies—all of which I put away for future need as I can use nothing of that kind while I am in the sanatorium.

I am a Baptist and I believe God will help those who help themselves. I have lots of faith in God and I believe so much in prayer and since I have received all your good letters my faith has been strengthened wonderfully. Will all of you dear ones accept this as an answer to your letter as I cannot do more?

Thanking you all for your kind remembrances and dear Mrs. Wilkinson for making it possible for me to receive them, I am your friend and sister in Christ.

MRS. BIRDIE MILLION,

CALIFORNIA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Please admit a sister who has been taking the paper for some time and enjoying it. My mother used to take it when I was a small child. I am twenty-three years old now and have been married but a few months and of course think my husband is one of the best. I've known him for years but hadn't seen much of him for six years as he was in the U. S. Navy. People may say what they want to about the blue jackets being bad boys but I'm here to say they are just like you find them the world over—there are good and bad in all professions and I pity them if they are any meaner than some men I've seen on the outside.

A few words to Mrs. Birdie Million of Arkansas. Have you tried eating raw eggs and drinking plenty of sweet milk and being rubbed with olive oil for your tuberculosis? I've seen that tried many times and it helped build the patient up.

Speaking of women having large families—I don't think it right unless the parents are able to care for the children and educate them and even then I think they should stop before the mother's health is gone. Some men want to keep their wives at home all the time and rejoice in the fact that they don't have time to go anywhere.

I'm glad to see so many states making it a law to use antiseptics in the new born babies' eyes—in the future we won't have so many blind children. There is nothing sweeter than a little flower of a baby and it is sad to think so many are blind through neglect, and not always in the poor families but in the wealthy as well.

About the divorce question. I think we should all do our best to please our husbands after marriage as we did before and then there would be fewer divorces. But if a divorce is necessary I think it is a sin for one party to marry as long as the other lives.

I'll come again and give some advice on the care of babies, as I was a nurse over four years and my special study was babies.

Wishing all happiness,

G. H.

NOVELTY, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

After reading Miss Pearl Whitt's letter I can keep silent no longer. She says women have held the "reins of government" in their hands for the past six thousand years and "The hand that rocks the cradle is the hand that rules the world." To read that you would naturally infer that the mothers were the only guides children had. Think of how many children have gone down to a drunkard's grave from a father's influence. This alone proves that fathers are helping to rule the world. Then she tells of a suffragette who registered at a hotel with eight different men, as the wife of each. She didn't stop to think that in telling of one indecent woman she was telling of eight indecent men. She speaks of woman suffrage as "usurping authority over the men." There is no true woman who wishes to do that but they do want equal rights with men and I am one of them and not the least bit ashamed of it either. I have known of wives and mothers where if they had had equal rights with men would have been well off. According to the law at the present time, after years of hard labor and saving a man and his wife may accumulate some of this world's goods which they have both worked for, and if the wife dies the husband is allowed to keep all the property but if the husband dies the wife must take a small share of the property while the balance goes to the children or her husband's relatives. If the husband has all the property, why not the wife as well? She is the weaker and needs it more and in most cases suffers more and works harder than the man does to earn it.

I have three sons and five little daughters and I don't want to die until I know that my daughters will have equal rights with me—mind you, I don't say "authority over men." It is no wonder that some men fight the suffrage movement just as the slave holders of old fought the freeing of their slaves. But God pity the woman who has become so accustomed to being a slave that she doesn't care to be free.

If Miss Dora Ennis reads this letter, please write to me. With love to all,

MRS. CALLIE SANDERS.

IRRIGON, OREGON.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have written several letters to this corner but none of them have been printed. However, this time I have a real reason for writing as I want to talk on the divorce question. How can people say divorce is all right when one of God's commandments to us says plainly, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," and in another place, "Whom God hath joined together let not man put asunder," and (Matt. xx.9) "Whosoever shall put away his wife and shall marry another committeth adultery; and whosoever marrieth her that is put away also committeth adultery." I suppose I could give other quotations from the Bible but these are enough, and unless you are an infidel. Mrs. C. Smith, you surely can't help seeing that marrying again after divorce is wrong. Please do not be offended, Mrs. Smith. I am not trying to criticize or judge you, which I have no right to do. You wished to hear different opinions so here is mine.

Sisters, do you know there is only one way to really know whether you are doing right or not and that way is taking your question to God? I dare say if Mrs. Smith, before her marriage at seventeen, had earnestly and sincerely asked God's guidance, knowing she would receive it, she would not have made her great mistake. I am only seventeen years old myself, but I know that is true. Why will people stray from the only path of happiness and then when they find themselves drifting deeper and deeper into misery, seek the world's way out of it? Whenever we find ourselves in deep trouble we might as well drop things right where we are and go to God with the things that are making us miserable. Sisters, if any of you who read this letter are downhearted or discouraged or in trouble of any kind, stop right now, before you do another thing and go and make your heart right with Jesus Christ. If you will search your heart for a moment you will realize that you must cast your cares upon the Lord before you can be happy.

I have seen many women going through their every-day routine of household tasks in a monotonous way, doing just what had to be done and grasping at a little pleasure now and then which was forgotten as soon as it was over. And that is just the way a great many women go through their whole life, and let me ask you, when they are gone how much better off is the world for their having lived in it? This may sound pretty strong but nevertheless it is true; that is just exactly what you, sister, are doing if you are not a real Christian. I'm not speaking of make-believe Christians, but real ones. Christians at heart are the only persons who ever really succeed in life, measuring by the true standard of success, and they are, as well, the only ones who are really happy.

You may tell me I am young and carefree and to wait till I begin to see some real trouble, and so on—then indeed is when I'll be glad I learned to lean on Jesus Christ when I was young and his comradeship will be doubly—oh, a hundredfold—more sweet.

Here I am preaching a regular sermon and I started to talk about divorces. Just the same, not until we get down to the bottom of things can we see these different things in their true light and if we take that light from the Bible we know we are right. So I wanted you to get that viewpoint and then tell me if you think divorce is right.

With sincere kind regards to all of you,
Your little-girl sister, EVANGELINE DOBLE.

GRATTON, N. DAK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND EVERYBODY:

Just a hasty call to COMFORT and I promise not to tarry and prevent some other sister from joining this ever sunshiny corner.

COMFORT and its readers did not disappoint me when I came to them in my loneliness, isolation and ill-

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

Framing the Face

POLLY has pretty features, yet never looks pretty. Ann has a high forehead, prominent ears, and not a particularly pretty face, yet she is always attractive. And Polly's reason and Ann's reason are one and the same—their hair!

Polly doesn't know what to do with hers, and so her pretty face looks out at you from an ugly frame. Ann has spent many painful half-hours experimenting, until she has learned just how to dress her hair to lower the line of her forehead conceal her ears, and provide a becoming setting for her almost plain face. And so, on coming away from her, if one were to ask if she were pretty, you would promptly say: "Yes!"—yet she isn't.

COVER THE EYES WITH THE HAIR BUT NOT IN SUCH AN EXTREME MANNER AS THIS.

Oh, there's witchery in hair, girls, and you must learn to do yours to the best advantage.

If you are young, and smooth skinned, and clear-eyed, and have a good low forehead, you may, if you choose, brush your hair softly back from your brow. But never, never, may you do this if your forehead is high, or if you have passed the thirty mark.

You may part your hair in the middle at any age—if you don't care how old you look—but if you wish to look as young as possible, try parting it a little to one side of the middle and only part half way back. It takes away half a dozen years at least.

With large ears, do the hair loosely and let it entirely cover the ears. You will have to handle the hair in sections to do this, as the section which covers the ears should be pushed forward a very tiny bit on the cheeks while the section just above does not want to be quite as far down on the forehead; so must be drawn back separately and pinned with separate pins. Of course when all the sections are pinned back, the hair looks as if handled in one piece.

I say to do this "with large ears," but I should go a step further; for unless you have the French style of face and are brushing your hair back and up, with absolute severity, into a plain French twist (and few faces can stand such severe lines), your hair should be dressed to at least partially cover the ears. If the hair is drawn away and up from them, it is impossible to get a soft, fluffy effect. While if the hair is permitted to half cover the ears, or even entirely cover them, a loose effect can be readily secured.

A rather attractive way of doing the hair, for a young face, is to adopt the side part (just half-way), draw the hair, in sections, loosely back to the nape of the neck, tie tight close to the head, divide in two sections, and do in two closely touching coils flat to the head.

A very good style for an older face, and one indeed becoming to almost any age, is as follows: Part a square from the crown part way down the back of the head then pin it in a tight flat coil; draw the parted front hair over this in two sections, pinning, then coil the ends on the back of the head; next, draw the left back and side hair (with ends turned under) over it and pin tight, finally draw the right back and side hair (ends turned under) up toward and just below the crown, and pin securely.

See what you can do with your hair this month.

Answers to Questions

Dora.—The scar on the cheek is difficult to remove. Probably the best you can do is to massage it gently with the finger-tips a couple of times a day. Dip the fingers in cold cream before massaging. Yes, brown hair can be dyed red, but it should be done by a professional. I never recommend dyes to an amateur, because it is a difficult task, and the novice is almost certain to ruin her hair.

Mrs. Ida W.—I am sorry it is against the rules of this department to answer letters by mail. I presume since your letter was written you have read the directions for taking the milk diet, which I published.

Mrs. Winnie C.—Get cocoa-butter from your druggist. It comes in small cakes. Hold a cake over a flame and while warm rub it on the breast gently, round and round, following the shape of the bust. Use it once a day. Be careful not to rub vigorously. Taking the milk diet is really a better way to increase the size of the bust, and the exercises I have given are also very effective.

Worried Sister.—I wish I knew how much you weighed, before I gave you any directions about reducing for—I have found that girls of nineteen sometimes think themselves too fat when they are not at all. For five feet five inches, you should weigh one hundred and forty, with a bust and hip measurement of thirty-eight and one half inches. I do not know just what you mean by a "short diet." If you mean you are cutting down the amount you eat, that may not be at all necessary, indeed may be undesirable. Just avoid potatoes, rice, macaroni, fats, gravies, sweets, cereals, cream, milk, much butter or sugar. But do not do this unless you are really overweight, for otherwise the body needs all these elements. Eat plenty of fruits daily. See answer to "Mrs. P. D." for formula for Epsom Salts Reducing Paste. I don't believe you need to use it, however. The lactic tablets are perfectly safe, but why use them, unless you weigh one hundred and sixty or something like that? By attempting to reduce, if you do not need it, you are likely to impair health, complexion and general appearance, so go easy, my dear.

Gray Eyes.—Read this month's chat with my girls for an answer to your question about eyebrows. Do not use the lotion you suggest, for your tan. Try this, instead:

Face Bleach

Fifteen drops of tincture of benzoin, one ounce of strained honey. The white of one egg, enough ground barley to make a paste which will spread easily.

Cut a piece of cheese-cloth to cover the face, making holes for eyes, nose and mouth. Spread the paste on the face, cover with the cheese-cloth and wear all night. In the morning, remove mask, wash face with warm soapy water, then rinse in warm water, and dry. Repeat for several nights.

Mrs. P. D.—The Epsom Salts reducing paste is as follows:

Epsom Salts Reducing Paste

Dissolve one and one half bars of white kitchen soap in a quart of boiling rain-water, over the stove. When the soap is all dissolved and you merely have a liquid, add to this a pound of Epsom Salts which has been dissolved in a pint of rain-water. The soapy liquid should be partially cooled before adding the salts solution. Beat. Massage this preparation into the fleshy parts of the body at night and allow to dry on the skin. Wash off in the morning. Twice a week lie for several minutes in a tub of very hot water in which you have dissolved half a boxful of ordinary baking soda. When you are very hot indeed jump out, dry yourself very rapidly and wrap yourself in a warm blanket. Lie down for half an hour, and let yourself perspire heavily. At the end of that time, rub in the Epsom paste.

Evelyn May.—The thing for you to do is to keep your body in good healthy condition, for the health of your hair depends on that. Eat plenty of good nourishing food, cereals, potatoes, rice, green vegetables, milk, cream, butter, fruits, meats, fish; exercise every day in the open air, and sleep with plenty of fresh air in your room. Shampoo your hair once in three weeks. There was a formula for a shampoo liquid in last month's COMFORT. Brush it one hundred strokes every night. If your hair is curly, part it round the head, from ear to ear. Part the front half in the middle or a little to one side, from crown to forehead, and, slightly rolling each side away from the face, bring the two halves of the front together at the crown and tie with a big ribbon bow. Now let the ends of this hair fall in with the back half of the hair, and tie again just at the nape of the neck or fasten with a big shell barrette. If your forehead is high in the middle, parting the hair on one side will be best, since you can draw the hair down a little on the forehead; while if it is high on the sides, you should part it in the middle, and, when rolling it, let it lie out a little on the sides.

E. A. P.—See answer to "Evelyn May"—a good style for you, whether your har is straight or curly.

Happy, Mont.—There is no cream which will fatten sunken cheeks, the only way to do that is to build up the body. Get to work at that. The milk diet is by far the best way, and you will achieve your result in five or six weeks, I am sure. Try it.

Beulah M.—I am sorry it is against the rules of this department to answer letters by mail. The household ammonia is the kind to use for removing superfluous hair.

Perplexed.—I am sorry not to have answered your letter sooner, but, you know, to print a magazine with the immense circulation of COMFORT, the work has to be done a long time in advance, so no letter is sure of getting an answer inside of three months, and where there are so many, there is often more delay. However, so many of my girls ask similar questions, that quite often you will find an answer to the problem troubling you long before your own inquiry is reached by me. If your hair is so very oily, it shows that the little oil glands are not in a healthy condition. Sometimes, if the soap is not rinsed out of the hair thoroughly when shampooing, it clogs the scalp, checks the natural outlet of the oil, thus irritates the glands, and they begin to secrete an abnormal amount of oil. Keep the scalp perfectly clean and free from soap, rinsing ever so many times after each shampoo. Sun the hair in the open air, brush many times a night, massage the scalp with the finger-tips nightly, and shampoo once in two weeks. Massage will do more to make the hair grow than anything else. You can use this lotion rubbed into the scalp with the fingers, when massaging:

Lotion for Greasy Hair

Alcohol, one ounce; witchhazel, one ounce; distilled water, one half ounce; resorcin, twenty grains.

After shampooing and rinsing the hair, always use cold water for the final bath—very cold water, so that the scalp receives a good healthy shock.

Brown Eyes.—You weigh too little for your height. For five feet six inches, the weight should be about one hundred and forty-three pounds. If your bones are large, you might weigh a little less and yet be in good proportion. You say your nose is too long. Perhaps it looks so because your face is too thin, and, when you get fatted up a trifle, the nose may not seem thin or sharp. There is nothing to do to make it smaller, but you should avoid doing your hair high on your head, or in a direct line with your nose—as in a Psyche knot; and in purchasing hats be sure to avoid any which have a wing or fold of velvet standing back from the face as if continuing the line of the nose. Nothing to do for the eyes which are smaller than you wish! Just keep them in good condition by washing out with boric acid in the morning—a three or four per cent solution; buy it in liquid form at your druggist's—by never misusing them, and keeping the lids in good condition. But don't fail to increase that weight!

Miss M. H.—You can buy sulphuret of barium at your druggist's, or by mail from any drug-store. If you will notice what I said about using this as a depilatory, you will see I said the hair would come back again. It should only be used on or under the arms, and not even then if you desire to get rid of the hair altogether, for it will surely come back.

Blue Eyes, Tenn.—For the excessive perspiration under the arms; first, take a body bath the first thing in the morning—it is not enough to just wash under the arms. Second drink quantities of water, for though it will come forth in perspiration, the perspiration will not have as strong an odor as if you drank less. Third, eat plenty of fruit for the same reason to make the perspiration as odorless as possible. Fourth, scrub the armpits whenever you change your dress during the day—two or three times, say. Have a soft flannel pad filled with corn-starch, and after washing the armpits and rinsing thoroughly, dry, then rub the end of a cake of slightly moistened soap over the armpit. Be careful to do this very lightly, so there is no visible soap left under the arm. Afterwards, use the flannel pad and pat the armpit. The corn-starch will sift out and powder the armpit. Be sure to keep the bowels very open, as all of these things affect the perspiration.

Blue Eyes, Tenn. (S. H.)—If your hair has not come in since typhoid fever, I expect it would be a good thing to cut it very short—almost shingle it. Probably you did not cut your hair when you had typhoid, as you might. I had mine shaved close to the scalp and it came out again as thick and strong as possible, though I was sick three months. Whether you cut your hair or not, massage the scalp every night with your finger-tips. The principle thing you need to do is to feed the body well and get your health in perfect condition. Also brush the scalp every night.

M. A. N.—I am sorry that it is against the rules of this department to answer by mail. I gave an eyelash grower in last month's COMFORT, but for fear you have not seen it, use melted vaseline or warm olive oil, and brush the lashes gently with a mucilage brush dipped in the oil. For a bust developer, exercise is the best remedy next to the milk diet, but since you ask for a "neck fattener," also, it is evident you need a general fattening, so the milk diet is the thing for you. Try it for six weeks.

Sunshine.—See "Gray Eyes" for "Face Bleach" which is a good "Neck Bleach."

Blue Bell.—Your weight is exactly correct for your height, one hundred and twenty-five pounds for five feet two inches. Bust and hips could add two inches in size without being too large. If your cheeks are not full, perhaps you are a little too fat in some place—the legs, possibly—and so, though the right weight, haven't enough to go round. If any part of you is unduly fat, reduce it, by local exercise; then fatten up a little more generally. Massage—very gentle—will help plumpen your cheeks; vigorous massage reduces, remember. Use, of course cold cream on the fingers in massaging. Be sure to get eight or nine hours of sleep daily, with lots of fresh air in the room. Nervous people invariably look thin in the face, even when they are rested, their faces seem to plumpen up. Keep this in mind.

Miss A. M. G.—You could weigh three pounds more for your height, your bust could be one inch larger, and your hips should measure the same as your bust; weight should be about twenty-eight or twenty-nine inches, though at nineteen it is natural that you should be more slender than later. If you have blue rings under your eyes, you probably aren't as well as you ought to be. Do you drink eight or nine glasses of water a day? Be careful about getting chilled when you do not feel well, and especially keep the ankles warm. You say your hands are red and you have some freckles. If you do much work outdoors it is hard to keep both hands and face from showing some signs of it, but a good healthy tan is not unbeautiful. Wear broad-brimmed hats tied flat at the sides to shade the cheeks—or else wear a sunbonnet,—that is, about your outdoor work. For the hands, scrub them scrupulously every night before going to bed with toilet soap (not the yellow kitchen soap, ever) and a nail brush. Then dry very thoroughly and carefully, and rub a good hand lotion in. If the water is hard, soften it with a few drops of tincture of benzoin—or, better still, use rain-water. It is a good plan to have a bowl of almond meal on your washstand, and after washing the hands and slightly drying, pour a little almond meal in the palm of one hand and rub both hands thoroughly with it.

Hand Lotion and Whitener

Rosewater, four ounces; orange-flower water, four ounces; borax, one half dram; spirits of benzoin, one dram; bruised almonds, one ounce.

Add the bruised almonds to the rosewater and orange-flower water, and let stand for twenty-four hours, filter, then add the borax, keep stirring until the latter is entirely dissolved, then add the benzoin, drop by drop, continually stirring. You can have your druggist put this up.

Cupie.—Oatmeal bags are not used for "bleaching" the skin—only for cleansing it, but they are so good for that that the skin looks whiter for their use. Fill a bag three inches square half full of rolled oats, then use as a wash-cloth, dipping in the water very quickly. Pat the face dry after washing. See answer to "Blue Bell" and "Happy, Montana."

Gray Eyes.—For your height, five feet ten inches, you should weigh one hundred and fifty-four pounds, so you have fourteen pounds to gain. You could do this on the milk diet in one month or six weeks. Your bust measure is not too much, in fact could be one inch larger—forty-one inches; this is true, also, of the hip measurement. Your waist could be larger, as well. Here is an exercise for developing the muscles of the legs:

To Develop the Legs

Hands on hips, heels together, head erect and back straight, rise on the toes slowly, then, without letting the heels touch the ground, slowly lower the body by bending the knees while keeping the back perfectly straight, until it is in a squatting position, the buttocks touching the heels. Without moving the hands from the hips, raise the body to an erect position again, always keeping the back perfectly straight. Practise this fifteen or twenty times, twice a day.

Mildred.—The use of a depilatory removes the hair only for the moment; it always returns. The best method I know of for removing hair, next to electrolysis, which is, of course, the one sure, safe, quick way—is to use peroxide of hydrogen and ammonia. One day dampen the growth with peroxide and the next with ammonia. The peroxide bleaches the hair, the ammonia kills the roots. It is a very slow process, varying in length with different people. If the ammonia irritates the skin, stop the treatment for a couple of days, then resume.

A COMFORT Reader.—Your bust measure, thirty-six, and hip measure thirty-six, and waist measure twenty-six, is about right for your height, five feet two. It might even be an inch larger without exceeding the accepted measurements, though if you are small-boned the present measurements are probably better. You probably use too much soap, and do not rinse face or hands sufficiently. Use soap on the face only at night. When washing the hands, rinse very thoroughly, and dry carefully. See answer to "Miss A. M. G."

I. C. D.—The milk diet is the best way to gain. Take it for six weeks or two months. You need to weigh about one hundred and twenty-five for your age and size. You have seen directions in COMFORT since your letter to me was written. Yes, cocoa-butter would c use the growth of superfluous hair if used on the face. If I were you, and only seventeen, I should leave my bust alone. A slender bust is considered the fashionable thing for a girl of your age, and, indeed, the society woman of today is very anxious to be slender in that portion of her body and makes strenuous efforts to achieve that result, so don't worry, and do let yourself alone. Do not use cocoa-butter elsewhere, and at your age it is not advisable to use it on the bust. To develop the legs, see answer to "Gray Eyes." Another good exercise for the ankles and lower part of leg, is as follows:

To Develop Calf of Leg

Standing with heels together, hands on hip, head up, back straight, rise on toes slowly until you are standing on their very tips. Now let the heel sink slowly to the floor, being as long about it as possible. Practise this exercise until the muscles of the leg feel tired.

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Mid-Winter Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

AS the season advances the styles become more attractive and pleasing. Especially noticeable is the popularity of the new one-piece coat dress, which is nice in serge, satin or velvet. Comfortable, practical aprons are always attractive to the neat housekeeper, and a model that protects the dress, and does not hamper the arm movements is to be recommended.

Evening dresses show new and novel effects in Empire style.

Children's garments are quaint and attractive with the new pocket trimmings, the coatee effects and new yoke shapings.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated.

1883—A Good Sensible Apron. This style has several practical features. It envelopes the figure and is cut so wide over the shoulders as to almost supply sleeve sections. The fullness of the apron may be held by the belt or worn loose.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires four and three eighths yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1881—Practical Cover-all Apron. Gingham, lawn, percale, alpaca, drill, linen, and sateen are all good for this style. The model is made to slip over the head and is closed in front with lacing through eyelets. This design could serve as a morning dress.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires five and three eighths yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1905—Dress for Misses and Small Women. The waist is full beneath the yoke sections which form part of the back. The full pockets on the fronts may be omitted. This model is good for gabardine, serge, novelty, plaid and check suiting, for velvet, corduroy and broadcloth.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires five and one eighth yards of 44-inch material for a 16-year size.

1896—Ladies' Capes in several styles. One may have old furs that can be cut up to meet the styles, or one may make these attractive accessories of velvet, plush or other pile fabrics. Taffeta, corduroy, velour and faille are equally nice. The styles here shown are cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires, for No. 1; one yard of 36-inch material; for No. 2, three quarters yard of 27-inch material for No. 3; one yard of 44-inch material.

1910—Waist. 1907—Skirt. An Elegant gown for many occasions. Gabardine, serge taffeta, voile, satin, velvet, corduroy and broadcloth are all nice for this model. The waist pattern is cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure.

The skirt is in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30 and 32 inches waist measure. It will require six yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size for this costume. Two separate patterns, 10c for each pattern.

1900—A new and attractive Ladies' Dress. This style is nice for satin, taffeta, serge, duvetyn, broadcloth, velour, gabardine and velvet. It would be effective and pretty in combinations of cloth and silk or satin.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. Size 36 requires six and three eighths yards of 44-inch material.

1885—Ladies' Combination of Corset Cover and Drawers. This model is fine for crepe, nainsook, batiste, lawn or silk. The cover may be finished with square or round neck outline.

Cut in seven sizes; 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires three and five eighths yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1893—Waist. 1892—Skirt. A Practical Business Costume. Novelty suiting, plaid or checked woolen, serge, voile, corduroy or velvet would serve for the skirt, while linen, madras, batiste, flannel or taffeta is nice for the waist. The waist pattern is cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure.

The skirt in seven sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32 and 34 inches waist measure. It requires two and three eighths yards of 36-inch material for the waist and three and three quarters yards for the skirt for a medium size. Two separate patterns, 10c. for each pattern.

1913—A Serviceable Set of Bags. This group represents some new features in bags, attractive, practical and convenient. No. one is a smart, roomy work bag, with firm upper portions and ample space for any article one may wish the bag to hold. No. two is a dainty opera bag. No. three may be developed as a handbag, good for many uses.

These three attractive models are cut in one size; it requires for No. one, three quarters yard of 36-inch material, for No. two, five eighths yard and for No. three, one half yard.

1919—Ladies' Shirt-waist. Flannel, madras, lawn, batiste chambrey, taffeta, linen, drill, satin, faille, and other seasonable materials may be used for this style.

Made in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires two and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1887—Ladies' House Dress, with sleeve in either of two lengths. Percale, lawn, dimity, gingham, chambrey, drill, linene, seersucker and galatea are good for this model. The style is new and attractive. The skirt has ample fullness and good lines.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1908—Ladies' Night Gown. This model may be made with an underfacing for eyelet closing and with or without yoke facings. It may have long sleeves with turnback cuffs, or short sleeves gathered to a band.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires six and one eighth yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1936—A Simple School Dress with sleeve in either of two styles. Striped woolen in brown tones was used in this instance, with trimming of brown velvet. The belt portions are stitched to form convenient pockets at the sides. The skirt is gored and is arranged in smart plaits.

Cut in five sizes; four, six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires three and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a six-year size.

1903—Child's Dress, with or without pocket and belt, and with sleeve in either of two styles. Poplin, repp, serge, gabardine, gingham, percale, galatea, chambrey, crepe, velvet or taffeta could be used for this style. It is also nice for challie and cashmere. The fullness of the dress may be gathered or smocked between the belt sections.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires two and five eighths yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size.

1614—Child's Set. Comprising a yoke dress with sleeve in wrist or elbow length a slip and one-piece drawers. These designs embody comfort and utility, and as they are simple in construction they are easy to develop.

The pattern, comprising all styles illustrated, is cut in four sizes; one, two, four and five years. The dress requires two and one half yards, the slip two yards and the drawers three quarters yard of 36-inch material, for a two-year size.

1918—Child's Rompers with round collar or square neck outline and with long or short sleeve. Gingham, chambrey, drill, galatea, flannelette and serge are good for this style. The pattern is composed of a waist and bloomers which may be joined to the waist or buttoned on separately.

1911—A Jaunty Junior Model. The waist and skirt may be finished separately or joined under the belt. The skirt is gored and arranged in smart plaits.

Cut in three sizes; 12, 14 and 16 years. It requires four and one half yards of 44-inch material for a 14-year size.

1500—Ladies' House Dress with two styles of collar, with long or shorter sleeves and with or without pockets. This style is good for gingham, seersucker, lawn, sateen, linene, linen, and drill. It could be developed as a dress for business wear. Ample pockets trim the skirt, which is cut with five gores.

Cut in six sizes; 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, and 42 inches bust measure. It requires seven yards of 36-inch material for a 38-inch size.

1891—A Smart and pretty style for Mothers' Girl. Serge, gabardine, voile, prunella, checked suiting and plaid mixtures, taffeta, velvet and corduroy are nice for this style. The trimming could be of matched satin on serge or of checked or plaid suiting.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires three and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for a 10-year size.

1940—Ladies' Dress consisting of a one-piece overdress and an under-waist, with sleeve in either of two lengths. This design is lovely for combinations of material. In blue serge, with waist of crepe in a matched or contrasting shade, the model will be suitable for general wear and also for more formal occasions.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires two and one half yards of 44-inch material for the under-waist, and three and seven eighths yards for the overdress, for a 36-inch size.

1938—One-piece overdress having an under-waist in surplice style, with sleeve in either of two lengths for misses and small women. This style is charming in its simplicity and especially adapted to slender figures.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires four and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for the underdress, and three yards for the overdress, for an 18-year size. The under-skirt measures about two and one eighth yards at the foot.

1528—A Simple, Neat School Frock, with sleeve in either of two lengths. The design is nice for serge, for voile and corduroy. The skirt is a three-piece model, cut with graceful flare and ample fullness. The sleeve is good in either length.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires two and one half yards of 44-inch material for an eight-year size.

1629—A Popular Apron. Just the thing to make "in a hurry" and to find convenient and comfortable ever after. This style is nice for ginghams, seersucker, alpaca, sateen, lawn, linen, drill and percale.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires five and one half yards of 27-inch material for a medium size.

Marigolds

By Hapsburg Liebe

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THERE were four Tom Carters in the White Rock Mountain section. There was Big Tom and Little Tom, Long Tom and California Tom. It had not been the call of the wanderlust that had sent the latter-named Tom Carter to California; it had been an unhappy love affair. He hadn't stayed there long; he had spent four days in San Francisco, that was all. The city is merciless, very merciless, to the hill man. The city does not understand the mountaineer, and no more does the mountaineer understand the city. Your hill man, if he is true to his ideals, cannot look up to a foreman; he cannot ask too earnestly for work, and when he is down he can neither beg nor steal—under any ordinary circumstances. His pride may be primitive, but it is also the finest, as well as the most stubborn, pride under the sun.

When Lettie Allen married the son of her father's bitterest enemy, instead of Tom Carter, they went to Memphis, in the other end of the state, to live. They couldn't live on in their home country, for neither side would have them; they were cast out, and their names never mentioned; but they needn't have gone to Memphis. They needn't have gone to any city. Two years later Jonathan Perry died and left his young wife Lettie with a year-old baby and utterly without means.

Lettie lived in a hand-to-mouth existence in the outskirts, in a very poor little wooden house. In the narrow front yard she grew a round bed of marigolds; she had nothing but these to remind her of her beloved dim-blue mountains. She worshiped the golden yellow flowers, and sometimes she wept over them when it was dark and no one could see.

During those two long, long years, California Tom had grown stern and silent. He had not forgotten Lettie Allen. He was not a man to forget anything. Tom remembered how cold San Francisco had seemed to him, and he reasoned that Memphis must seem equally cold to Lettie and the man she had married. No word ever came from them, which worried Tom. So he hied himself to Memphis, without letting anybody know where he was going, to see that all was well with Lettie and her husband. He didn't know of Perry's death, of course; he would have gone to Memphis sooner, had he known of that.

To find them in such a big town—that was the problem. He knew nothing of city directories. He looked for them as he would have looked for a squirrel or a wild turkey in his mountains; days and days he spent in watching for them on the streets. It required patience. And it required money. California Tom's money was all gone, and he was on the verge of starvation, when he found Lettie.

It was at sundown, and Tom was in the outskirts looking, always looking, for Lettie and Jonathan. He was tired; he was so weak from hunger that his steps were slow and halting, strangely like those of an old man. Then he saw her bed of marigolds. They were the first marigolds he had seen in Memphis. If he had not seen them, he would have passed her poor little house without knowing that she lived there. The marigolds found him for her. her.

Tom went in. The yellow flowers were so many messages of love from home to him—to him, lone and lonesome, a wanderer in a strange land. He sank down wearily, half delirious, beside them. For five minutes he drank in their fragrance gratefully. Then Lettie came out, and she carried her year-old child in her arms.

"I hight ha' knowed you lived here, Lettie," said Tom, going to his feet with something like a new strength in his limbs. "How goes it wi' you and Jonathan and the baby, Lettie?"

"Tom Carter!" cried Lettie, her voice betraying both joy and sadness. "How come you here, Tom?"

"I jest happened to be in town, and I thought I'd look you and Jonathan up," Tom smiled a little pitifully. "How goes it wi' you and Jonathan and the baby, Lettie?"

"Jonathan's been dead a long time, Tom," murmured Lettie. Three months is a long time to a mountaineer alone in a big city; it is a century. She went on: "They buried him in a place they call a potter's field."

"Do ye need anything, Lettie?" blurted Tom.

Lettie straightened, for the hill pride was not yet dead. Then she turned her sad brown eyes toward her baby's wan face, and went deathly pale. A great struggle was going on in the little woman's heart. She looked back at Tom. He seemed so big and so strong, and so dependable. She didn't know of his gnawing hunger and his weakness.

"Yes," she admitted tremulously. Mother love is mightier, even, than the pride of the hills. "Yes, Tom, we need everything!"

With the last word she fainted. Tom caught her and carried her into the house. She still held her baby against her breast. Tom put her on a bed and revived her.

"Listen, Lettie," he said. "I got plenty o' money, and I'll go and git some good things to eat. Don't you worry now, Lettie, acause I shore have got oodles o' money." He lied like a gentleman.

Tom made his way out to the fast darkening street, and as he went he whispered over and over to himself—"Thank God I come! Thank God I found 'em!"

The hill man walked a block, stopped and leaned against a decaying picket fence. How was he to get provisions? There was but one answer: He must steal them. He could, doubtless, he reasoned, beg something for them to eat; but begging was infinitely worse than stealing. An hour later California Tom broke into a small suburban grocery store and came out with two baskets full of packages, and he did it without being seen.

When the feast was over, Tom took the baby on his knee and looked inquiringly toward Lettie.

"Would ye like to go back home?" he asked.

"They wouldn't le' me come back," said Lettie. "Pap he told me ef I married one o' them lowdown Perrys I couldn't never darken his door ag'in, and you know him well enough to know 'at he keeps his word."

"I believe he'd break it this one time," muttered Tom. "They're all tore up about you, Lettie. Ef you cain't go back home, you can go to my people, I'm shore o' that. You've got to leave here: you cain't stay here no longer. This hain't no place for you."

"Ef I was to go to yore people——"

He never knew what she meant to say, for she never finished. She lapsed into a thoughtful silence.

"Ef I'll loand ye the money," asked Tom, "will ye go?"

She didn't answer. Again he asked the question, and again she made no answer.

"You used to love me, Lettie," murmured Tom. "Do you reckon you could ever love me any more? Ef ye could, we'd be married, and 'en you could go back home without borrying money from anybody. I wish to goodness, Lettie, you'd say, 'yes.'"

"Yes!" said Lettie; and she smiled and was beautiful. "I allus loved you, Tom. I loved you when I married Jonathan. Jonathan he lied to me about you, and he was mean enough to tell me about it afterward. He told me you said I'd be tickled to death to git you—and so, like a fool, I married him to spite you! Yes, Tom, I'll marry you, and I'll be glad to marry you, whenever you want me to!"

Tom rose and kissed her on the forehead; then he gave her the child and put on his hat.

"I've—I've got a little business to 'tend to, and 'en I'll come with a license and a preacher, and we'll be married and git right on a train and go back home," said California Tom.

He kissed her again on the forehead, and went out to the street. Once more he walked a block, stopped, and leaned himself against a decaying picket fence. Where was he going to get the money necessary to pay their way back to eastern Tennessee?

For four successive days Tom Carter tried to get work and failed. There was work, but he didn't know how to find it. He hated to make more excuses to Lettie. Driven to desperation, he decided to turn robber long enough to get the money necessary for their trainfare and marriage expense. The house he picked out for the scene of his first burglarizing happened to be the home of a man high up in police circles, and Tom entered it an hour before the break of day, when most people sleep soundest.

He entered it by an up-stairs window that looked out upon the roof of a broad veranda. His hands trembled as he felt his way along the walls; they had never trembled like that before. Tom figured that a well-to-do family like that which lived in this house would keep money lying almost anywhere—on mantels, dressers, almost anywhere. He went down a broad flight of stairs without noise, and found a mantel. There was no money lying on it. Next he found a table, and there was no money lying there, either. Then he stumbled over something, and it made a noise. Tom held his breath. A moment later the lights flashed on, and a big, broad man in a long green robe appeared on the stairway landing with a revolver in his hand.

"Hands up—quick!" said the man.

Tom put up his hands. The man of the house half turned to a sixteen-year-old boy who stood on the stairway above.

"'Phone headquarters and tell them to send somebody out here after this burglar," he ordered.

The boy carried out his father's instructions. The man of the house then went to Tom and made sure that he had no weapons.

"Sit down," he said, not unkindly.

Tom sat down.

"You don't look like an ordinary burglar," said the man with the revolver, taking a chair himself. "And I don't think you are an ordinary burglar. Why did you break into my house?"

California Tom Carter, from White Rock Mountain, told the lieutenant of police everything in a straightforward way. By the time he had finished the man from headquarters had come to make the arrest and it was daylight.

"Hold him here," said the lieutenant, "until I dress myself. I want to make some investigations before I give him over to you."

Half an hour, and the three men came to a halt before Lettie Perry's poor little house. The eyes of the lieutenant of police were turned toward Lettie's bed of marigolds. Then the lieutenant looked toward silent Tom Carter.

"I don't want any more proof, Tom," he said. "We'll not bother your Lettie. Will you let me lend you enough money to marry you two and carry you back to your mountains?"

Tom's lips moved jerkingly: "Shore!"

Two minutes later the lieutenant of police and the man from headquarters turned away from Lettie's gate. The lieutenant wore a marigold on his coat lapel.

"You see," he said to his companion, "I came here from the mountains, twenty years ago, and I know how it is."

ness, but answered the call at once.

Hundreds and hundreds of letters came and even yet, an occasional letter comes. Through COMFORT, I found a schoolmate of long, long ago, and was heartily made glad by a loving letter. Some addresses were too dim to read, being written with lead pencil—some wrote beautiful letters and sent cards and gave no address, but I thank everyone of them!

To the dear ones who sent stamps, to the loving, Christian-hearted sisters who continue to write, who have helped me in hundreds of ways, I give my heartfelt gratitude and in every possible way I can, will pass their kindness on.

I have been appealed to for help in any form, clothes, stamps, shoes and money, until my heart was sick when I had no more to give.

What pitiful letters were some I received, and I know that COMFORT does not yet fully realize all the good it does, taking comfort and help into each home, however humble.

Our own shack is all the brighter now and as the darksome winter days come on, COMFORT and its readers will reward my faith in them by at least sending us a kindly, loving thought—occasionally. The editorial is fine—and shows kindly consideration for humanity.

I am doing all I can to get up as large a contribution for Uncle Charlie's Home as possible for one situated in as restricted isolation as I. To all who

Terms Used in Knitting

K. knit plain; o. over; o. 2, over twice; n. narrow 2 stitches together; p. purl, meaning an inversion of stitches; sl. slip a stitch; tog. together; sl. and b., slip and bind; k. p. knit plain; stars and parenthesis indicate repetition.

Knitted Hood and Sweater Year-old Size

MADE according to directions these garments will be the right size for a year-old child. To make the sweater for a larger child, all that is necessary is to follow the directions in a general way, but knit to the size of a pattern for an older child. Required material—Between three and four skeins of white saxony, one half skein pink saxony and one half skein light green saxony. Two pairs needles No. 13 or 14.

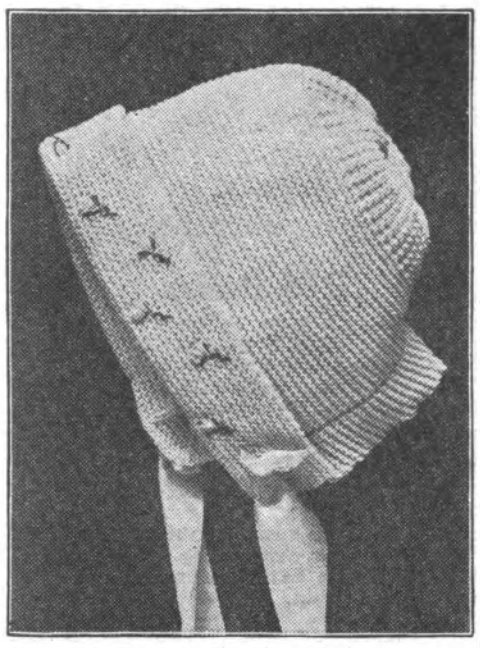
Directions for Knitting Hood

The hood is begun in the center of the crown. Cast on 50 stitches. The first seven rows are in Brioche stitch which is made as follows:—

1st row.—Wool over, slip 1, insert needle as though to purl, that is, on side opposite to ordinary stitch, knit two together, and repeat to end of row.

2nd row.—Over, slip 1, as though to purl, knit together the next st. and the thread which lies over it, and repeat to end of row.

Repeat this row six times more. Next seven rows of a fancy stitch made in this way; * k. first 4 sts., p. 1, k. 3, p. 1, k. 3, p. 1, repeat from * ending row with k. 4. This makes 14 rows.



15th row.—K. plain. Cast 10 sts. on end of this row, turn.

16th row.—K. 9, p. 1, k. plain to end, cast on 10 sts., turn.

17th row.—K. 9, p. 1, k. to other purled st., p. 1, k. 9. Repeat this row 30 times.

Purl 3 rows. Knit 12 rows for turn back and bind off.

Sew up the back of the hood from the neck

27th row.—Same as 25th.
28th row.—Same as 26th.
29th row.—K. 14, p. 2, k. 4, p. 2, k. 4, p. 2, k. 4, p. to end.
30th row.—P. k. 4, p. 2, k. 4, p. 2, k. 4, p. 2, k. 14.
31st row.—K. 14, p. 2, k. 4, p. 2, k. 4, p. 2, k. 4, p. 2, k. to end row.

Make 8 more rows like the 31st row. All knitted plain excepting the purled stitches which form the border around the bottom. Bind off the last 30 sts. on end of work opposite purling for the armhole, knit 1 row from here, to the bottom and back again, then cast on 30 stitches and make 70 rows for the back, making the purling across the bottom. Make the second front to correspond with the first.

Sleeves

Cast on 62 stitches, knit 42 rows. Make cuffs of 28 rows Brioche st. the same as used in hood, finish off with 6 rows knitting, bind off and sew up.

Lay fronts and backs together and sew up shoulders, sew in sleeves.

Collar

Cast on 70 sts. for the collar, knit 4 rows, purl 6 rows, knit 12 rows and bind off. Sew to neck. Finish with either a crocheted cord and pink and white balls or ribbon.

High Crocheted Boots

Begin with ch. 11, turn, 1 s. c. in each of 10 sts., ch. 1, turn, 9 more rows of 10 s. c. each, worked through both loops of each stitch. Now 1 s. c. down side, 2 s. c. in corner st., 1 s. c. in each st. across end, 2 s. c. in corner, 1 s. c. up side, ch. 21 sts., fasten to opposite side, break thread. Fold ch. together and in 11th or center st. of back work 1 s. c., 1 s. c. in each st. all around, join to first s. c. by sl. st., ch. 1. Next row in center st. of toe make 2 s. c., otherwise same as last row. 2 more rows 1 s. c. in each st. Next row sk. a st. on each side of the toe. Next row, sk. st. in center of toe, 1 row 1 s. c. in each st. next 2 rows sk. couple of sts. To draw in heel a little add row of s. c. in each st. and break thread.

CROCHETED BOOTS.

Start again in center of back, 1 s. c. in each st. all around, join to first st., one is now beginning to make leg of boot. Make 20 rows, single crochet, working through both loops of each st. and increasing by making 2 s. c. in center st. in back in every third row or as is necessary.

21st row.—1 tr. c. in each st. join, ch. 1, 8 more rows of s. c. and finishing top with picot scallop of 1 s. c., 1 d. c., 1 p., 1 d. c., 1 p., 1 d. c., 1 p., 1 d. c., 1 s. c., repeat. Run ribbons through the treble row of crochet as shown.

To make the little garments very attractive, one can now add a touch of the popular wool embroidery, by scattering tiny rosebuds down the front of the sweater, on the turnback of the hood and on the boots as shown. The directions for the boots as given will fit over a year-old child's shoe.

Directions for Embroidering Rosebuds

Thread a darning needle with the pink wool and take a lazy daisy stitch about one half inch long. Bring needle out near starting point and take a second stitch a bit longer than the first, add a third the length of the first, add similar stitches on either side of green wool and one straight stitch in the opposite direction to form stem.

A Rosebud Afghan

A beautiful rosebud afghan may be made to complete a child's carriage outfit as follows. Make five or six inch squares in twilight stitch of baby blue saxony and squares of an equal size in single crochet of white saxony, by working back and forth and taking up both loops of each stitch, thus making the work solid and also giving a rather star like effect to the stitch. Make a chain one at the end of each row to keep the work even. Embroider the white squares with rosebuds, then join all by alternating the squares. Bind with a satin ribbon or finish with a scallop.

Crocheted Sleeveless Jacket

FOR MISS M. E. STAMM.

Materials required. 4 skeins Germantown 2 skeins saxony for border, 1 medium and 1 fine bone crochet hook.

To make a jacket for a 36- or 38-inch person, begin with ch. 114 stitches. This jacket fits snugly, the center of the back and the fronts run off to points and half sleeves can be made or not as preferred.

1st row.—2 d. c. in 4th st. from hook, 1 d. c. in each of the next 54 sts., then as the widening is done in the center of the back, work 3 d. c., ch. 2, 3 d. c. in the 55th st., 1 d. c. in each of the next sts., excepting the last, in which work 3 d. c., ch. 3, turn.

2nd row 2 d. c. in 1st working through the back loop only to form a rib, 1 d. c. in each d. c., widen as in first row, by working 3 d. c., ch. 2, 3 d. c. under ch. 2 of preceding row and work 3 d. c. in last st., ch. 3, turn.

Repeat the 2nd row until one has 15 rows, for a sleeveless jacket or 22 rows if half sleeve is desired. Fasten off.

For sleeveless jacket do not break thread, but at end 15th row, turn and work back on 30 stitches, as usual, then ch. 3, turn, work to end again. Repeat making 5 more rows on the 30 stitches. Make 3 d. c. in front edge of each of these rows, but finish with 1 d. c. on opposite end as directed. Break wool. Finish opposite front in the same way.

Now count 30 stitches from the center of the back. Join wool and work 30 d. c. on 30 d. c., increasing in center as usual then 1 d. c. in each d. c. to corresponding stitch of first d. c. ch. 3, turn. Repeat, making 6 more rows in this way.

To join the jacket under the arms, count 30 stitches from the front of one front and 30 stitches from the center of the back, join the remaining 14 or 15 sts. together by single crochet, now s. c. along the ends of the short rows to draw these in a little to form under part armhole. Join opposite side in same way. In jacket with 22 complete rows, join under arms by working s. c. on 23 stitches after counting 30 stitches from center of back and fronts.

Begin border at under arm seam.

Border. Ch. 3, * skip 2 chs., 4 d. c., skip 2 chs., 1 d. c. and repeat from * all around, putting 9 d. c. in center of back and at each corner of front, be careful not to skip any chains, when turning the corners at the neck to prevent puckering. Join.

2nd round.—Ch. 3, * 4 d. c. in center of shell of preceding row, 1 d. c. on d. c., repeat all around and join.

3rd round.—Ch. 3, 5 d. c. in center of shells, 1 d. c. on d. c., edge armholes in the same way.

A picot edge of colored wool or silk can be added to the borders if one fancies.

Crocheted Carriage Robe in Twilight Chain

BY MRS. A. A. WERTMAN.

This robe or afghan is of two colors, the outside which is illustrated being made up of heavy wool crocheted and placed over white saxony knitted lining. Materials, 4 skeins heavy or coarse pink of baby blue wool. Medium size bone crochet hook, 2 skeins white saxony, 1 pair knitting needle, rather coarse so work will be loose.

Outside of Twilight Chain

With color make a rather loose chain, a yard long without stretching, turn. Sk. 7 sts., 1 sl. st. in each of the next 3 sts., ch. 3, sk. 3, 1 sl. st. in each of the next 3 sts. Repeat working in this way to the end of the chain, but finish with a group of 3 sl. sts.

2nd row.—Ch. 4, 3 sl. st. in ch. 3 below. Ch. 3, 3 sl. st. in next ch. 3, repeat to end finishing with 3 sl. sts., turn. Repeat until work is the desired size.

Knitted Lining

Of the white saxony make a lining of the same size of plain knitting. Pin together and working through both edges, finish with a crocheted fringe.

Fringe

With colored wool, fastened in end of corner row ch. 24, 1 sl. st., in the 19th and 20th chains from hook, ch. 4, 1 sl. st. next to fastened wool. Make 2 more chained loops and sl. st. next each other closely, to fill in and round corner. Next loop sl. st. to end of next row. Repeat this around all four sides.

Crocheted Beading

For Lingerie or Children's Dresses

This pattern is very pretty on children's dresses, run through with black velvet ribbon.

Ch. 22, 1 d. c. in 9th st. from hook, ch. 2, skip 2, 1 d. c., ch. 2, skip 2, 1 d. c., repeat making 2 more spaces, ch. 3, turn.

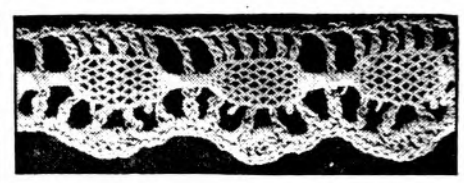
1st row.—2 d. c., in sp., 1 d. c. on double, 3 sps., 4 d. c., ch. 3, turn. Next 2 rows the same

4th row.—3 d. c., ch. 9, 4 d. c., ch. 3. turn.

5th row.—3 d. c., 1 sp., 4 d. c., 1 sp., 4 d. c., ch. 3, turn.

6th row.—7 d. c., 1 sp., 7 d. c., ch. 3, turn.

7th row.—3 d. c., 1 sp., 4 d. c., 1 sp., 4 d. c., ch. 3, turn.



8th row.—3 d. c., ch. 9, 4 d. c., ch. 3, turn.

9th, 10th and 11th rows.—all same as first. Then repeat pattern from 4th row.

Lobster Braid Edge for Curtains

The pattern can be very rapidly made and also makes an effective trimming along the straight edge, make 1 d. c. in each picot of the braid, ch. 2, 1 tr. c. around stem, ch. 2, and doubles as before.

On the opposite to make scallop, 1 d. c. around stem, on each side of the tr. st., ch. 2, 1 d. c., in first picot, * ch. 3, 1 d. c. in third picot, ch. 3, 1 d. c., in fourth picot, ch. 3, 1 d.

LOBSTER BRAID EDGE FOR CURTAINS.

c., in last picot, ch. 2, 2 d. c., around stem, 1 on each side of the treble. Repeat from * for length required.

Stocking with Fitted Knee-Cap Designed for Rheumatic Sufferers

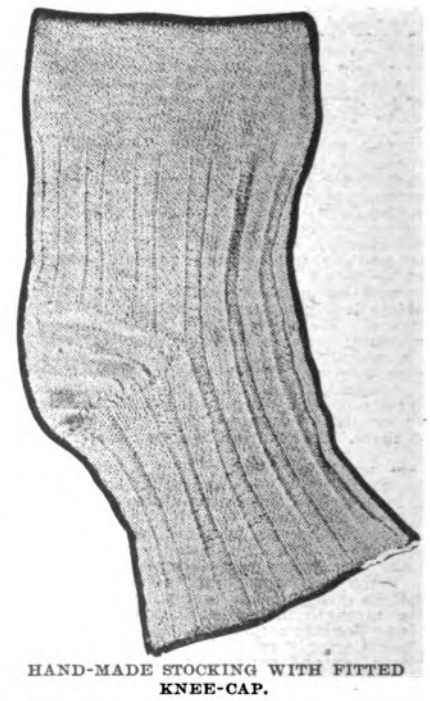
BY GEORGIA T. DRENNAN.

For solid comfort in cold weather nothing is better especially for elderly or rheumatic people, than such a stocking or knee-cap as is here shown.

It comes up well over the knee, fits snugly and will stay in place without a garter.

Either Germantown yarn, zephyr, mercerized knitting thread or soft cotton can be used knitting on either coarse or fine needles.

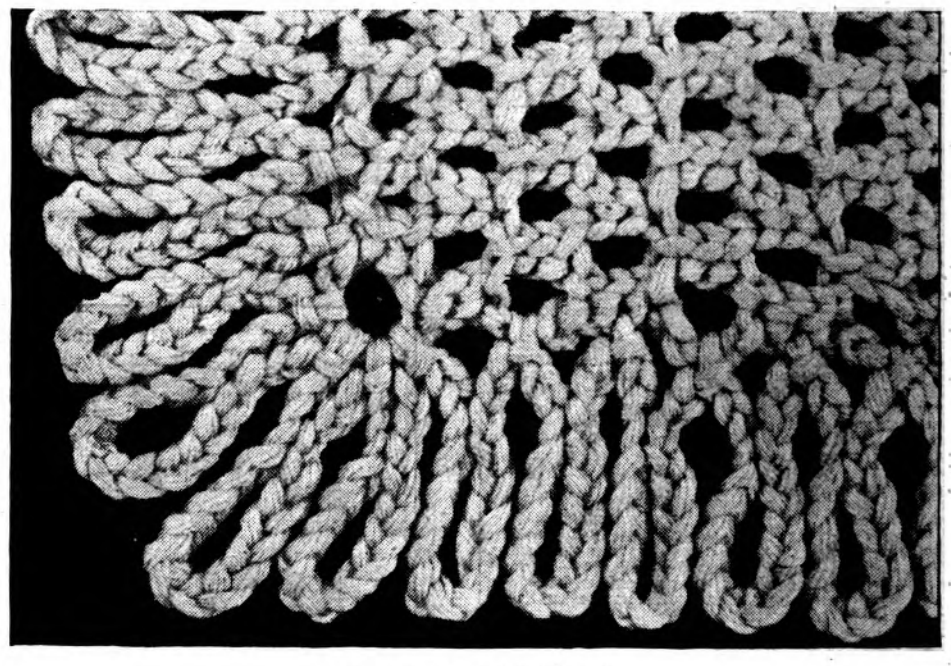
Cast up 100 stitches evenly on 3 steel knitting needles, and knit around plain.



Now k. 5, p. 5 sts. for 47 rounds. This makes the longitudinal ribbing which fits closely about the knee.

48th row or next row.—Knit off the first 25 sts., to begin the gore or the knee-cap.

49th row.—Knit across plain, taking up one st. from the end.



50th row.—Purl and take up one st. from the end.

Continue in this way for 5 rows. Then reverse making 5 purled and 5 plain rows alternately until the knee-cap is finished. Take up one st. at end of each row whether plain or purled.

HAND-MADE STOCKING WITH FITTED KNEE-CAP.

When only 40 sts. of the original ribbed portion are left, the upper half of knee cap is completed. Then knit plain and purl as before, but knit 2 sts. together at the end of each row, back and forth, to narrow the knee-cap down to ninety-nine stitches.

CROCHETED CARRIAGE ROBE.

Knit plain, purling the center stitch of third needle, to make seam down back of the leg.

Widen for the calf and then narrow for the ankle as usual in making stockings.

Knit the Heel

Turn the cap, narrow for the instep, knit the foot and narrow off the toe.

Bind off and make end of thread secure on wrong side.

BY KATE V. SAINT MAUR.

Points for Early Hatching

THE problem in the minds of the majority of poultry keepers at the present time is "How can I best secure a goodly number of strong, vigorous chicks from my spring hatches; large, vigorous fellows, free from any taint of disease, that will with good care, develop into strong, profitable adults to keep up my stock?"

For there are always a lot of old birds each year who are past their usefulness as egg producers, that must be disposed of. Hence, the necessity of producing a full quota of vigorous chicks each year if the productivity of the flock is to be maintained. The demand for strong chicks of high quality, is constant, and comes from many sources.

First, of course, the owner of his own plant wishes a goodly number for his own use. Secondly, the producer of high quality baby chicks has a large demand for the sale of these youngsters as day-old chicks, for which a very remunerative price is secured. Again, where one has secured a reputation for producing hatchable eggs and husky youngsters, a large quantity of hatching eggs can be sold at a profit during the spring months.

In selecting desirable breeders, both male and female, the first consideration should be that of vigor. The parents themselves should show a bright, prominent eye; a good, deep, wide body; a short, deep head, a good distance between the hock joints, and should be of suitable color pattern, characteristic of the breed represented. Second, the parents should be selected with some knowledge of their ancestry or pedigree.

In the beginning of the breeding work, owing to the lack of accurate records, it will often be impossible to know the exact ancestry, and external appearance will have to count for much. In such cases it may often be desirable to purchase good breeding males from reliable breeders, for which a fair price can well be paid.

A few selected birds, trap nested during the winter, will make possible systematic selection along egg-producing lines. Again, the parent stock should show every indication of health, and the poultryman should know that no disease has ever affected the birds selected to produce hatching eggs. Some diseases may apparently have beeen cured, but disease leaves the individual in a weakened condition, so that progeny from such individuals show tendencies toward infection. Health, then, should be a fundamental requirement.

Suitable parentage, consisting of carefully selected hens and cockerels, is fundamental. Pullets which are immature and late hatched should never be used for breeding. When pullets are used as breeders, a large percentage of eggs is often found infertile. On account of the small size of the eggs, the chicks at hatching time are correspondingly smaller than chicks otherwise produced. The progeny from small pullet eggs lack vitality throughout their lives, and if the practise is continued, a rapid deterioration in the efficiency of the flock will follow. The yearling hen mated to the vigorous cockerel, produces the best quality chicks.

In the breeding pen, fertility is of primary consideration, and special efforts should be made to attain a high percentage. In this regard, do not mate too many females to one male. With the light, active breeds, such as the Leghorns, one male to twelve or fifteen females seems about the right proportion. With the heavier breeds, such as the Plymouth Rocks, one male to ten females is as safe a ratio as can be followed. Season also influences the question. The early matings before the normal breeding season has commenced, should contain less females to a male than matings during late March and April.

Next we have to consider the handling of the hatching egg after it is produced, and the following points are of special significance. The eggs should, by all means, be laid in clean nests, for soiled, dirty eggs are bound to carry contamination which may affect the chicks disastrously. Frequent collection of the hatching eggs, especially in winter, when the temperature is very cold, is desirable, thus preventing chilling, and also preventing injury to the eggs. After collecting the eggs, they should be carefully graded. Eggs of uniform size, as near as possible, weighing about twenty-four ounces to the dozen, should be used. All exceptionally large eggs or malformed eggs should be sold for eating. Eggs of irregular, rough or thin shells should also be disposed of. Only normal shelled eggs of a uniform color and of an average size should be kept for hatching. They should be kept in a room where the temperature is not over fifty degrees, and never below thirty. Such a temperature retards evaporation and retains the quality of the egg.

A high temperature of seventy or eighty is apt to cause germ development which results in a dead embryo. It is not a good plan to hold hatching eggs any length of time before placing them in an incubator. It has been found, by careful experience, that the hatching power of the egg decreases as the length of the holding time increases. Even in a cool room and carefully turned, hatching eggs will deteriorate, and it can be stated that it is undesirable to keep them more than three weeks under any conditions, and one week is much better. It is a safe practise to place the eggs in such a way that they can occasionally be turned if they are going to be held for three or four days or longer.

Plenty of room is also needed in the breeding pen. Breeding birds should never be crowded. It prevents sufficient exercise and has a tendency to increase disease and parasites. Plenty of exercise should be the rule. This can be best accomplished by feeding considerable grain in deep litter. Lack of exercise tends to the formation of fat, and this is bound to increase fertility.

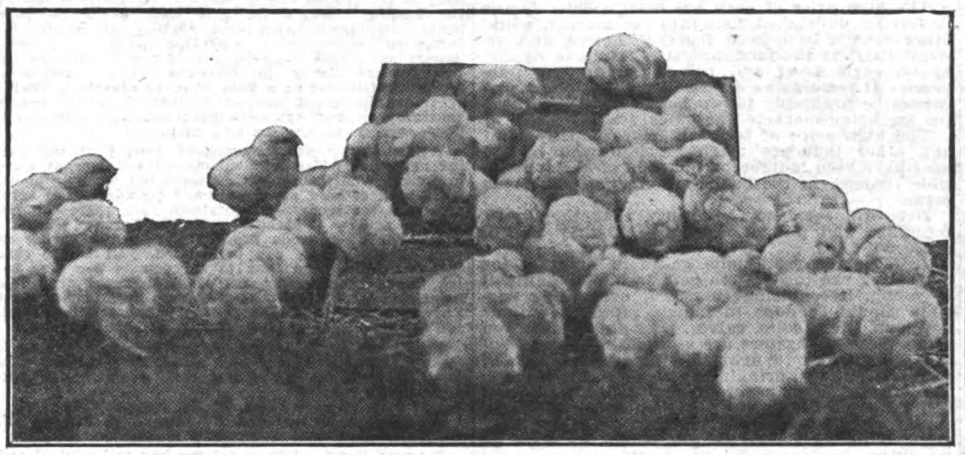
It is very desirable to construct a number of small houses, especially adapted to the management of the breeding flock, in which special matings can be made of a few selected birds, such flocks being given range during the winter and early spring in order to get them into suitable breeding condition. The feed for the breeding flock is very nearly identical with that required for the ordinary laying hens.

One noticeable exception can be made, and that is that the ration for the breeders should not be forced in any sense of the word. A ten to twenty per cent meat scrap mash is as concentrated as it is safe to go. Green food is necessary, as birds relish it, and seem to increase appetite and vigor. Plenty of feed should be given, but in such a way as to compel exercise and reduce the formation of excessive fat. The birds should be compelled to work for all the grain in dry, deep, clean litter.

The aim in the management of this breeding flock should be, first, large eggs, which are secured only from large, healthy, adult hens, fed a well-balanced ration in sufficient amount. Second, a fair number of eggs, which can be secured from any well-managed flock of healthy birds. Third, strong germs, which are secured by having the birds properly mated and well cared for. Fourth, a heavy albumen dense and free from an excessive amount of water, means eggs which will hatch livable chicks. These factors are assured in a flock of healthy birds which are not forced excessively for a maximum production.

Where to Put the Incubator

When only one or two incubators are to be run during the season, it is scarcely practicable to build or construct a special incubator cellar for that purpose, therefore the question arises as to what kind of room or place about the premises will be suitable for the operation of the incubator. Preferably they should be placed in the cellar or in a room with north windows instead of south, which is usually more apt to be more uniform in temperature day and night, because the southern windows absorb much heat from the sun during the day and lose this at night. It is also the temperature which should surround the eggs as they are turned and cooled day after day. If the room is too cool, the eggs will become too suddenly cooled and chilled, and if the room is too warm the eggs will not have a chance to become cooled sufficiently in the length of time allowed to remain out of the incubator.



The ventilation of the room is one of the most essential features which should be looked into before the machine is started. There must be a constant supply of fresh air in the incubator room, because the eggs in developing need a constant supply of fresh air. The gases given off during incubation must be removed and supplanted by fresh air.

Every incubator has some arrangement whereby fresh air is admitted to the machine at all times. Also every machine requires the airing or cooling of eggs at regular periods during the hatch. The purpose of this is to bring the eggs into contact with the fresh air Never allow an incubator room to become stagnant or filled with stale or disagreeable odors. The system of ventilation should be so managed that no drafts of wind blow across the room and strike the machine in operation.

There are several serious effects of drafts. In the first place, drafts interfere with the even burning of the lamp, causing the flame to flicker and even to smoke. This not only results in a variation in the temperature of the incubator, but fills the lamp and compartment with soot, taking away from its efficiency. There is also a serious risk of fire resulting from a flame that is kept flickering. Particular attention should be given to this point when there is a prevalance of strong winds out of doors. Avoid opening windows that are directly opposite in the room, particularly if the incubator is in a line between them. It is easy to get fresh air into a room without creating drafts.

Points to Remember in Running a Machine

First, temperature. The best temperature is known to be from one hundred and two to one hundred and three degrees on the fertile egg. A great variation from this either high or low, not only reduces the number of chicks hatched, but reduces the vigor and fertility of those which get out of the shell. A high temperature running continuously throughout the hatch results in an early hatch, and is apt to be accompanied by weak youngsters, while a low temperature results in a prolonged hatch and poor results. An ideal hatch which results is one which, due to uniform temperature, starts on or about the twentieth or twenty-first day, and is completely over with in from twelve to twenty-four hours.

WHITE WYANDOTTE CHICKS.

A second factor, of equal importance in the management of the incubation, should be the supplying of fresh air. The growing embryo needs a full supply of oxygen, without which the embryo cannot grow normally. This oxygen can best be supplied to the egg by causing fresh, pure air to flow into the machine and into the air chamber. This ventilation, as it is called, must take place continuously, but without any rapid movement which would cause a too rapid evaporation of the egg content.

Another consideration of equal or greater importance is the necessity of maintaining the moisture content to such a point that excessive evaporation will be prevented. If, due to dry atmospheric conditions, evaporation takes place rapidly, much of the contents of the egg, which otherwise would go into the chick, is given off into the air and the result is undersized chicks at hatching time. The big, heavy, fluffy youngsters can only be produced where a fairly high humidity is contained in the egg chamber. This high humidity also results in a better percentage of hatch, due to its effect upon the egg shell in making it thinner and more easily broken at hatching time. It is a good plan to insure this high humidity by sprinkling the eggs on the eighteenth or nineteenth day with warm water before closing the machine.

At hatching time the incubator should be darkened, thus keeping the chicks from trampling one another in an effort to get to the light. The quieter they can be kept, the better. The chicks should be allowed to remain in the machine until they are thoroughly dry, which is from twenty-four to thirty hours after the hatch is complete. These few points in regard to the proper care of the eggs in the incubator are essential.

The great advantage of early hatches is splendidly shown in a report from the New Jersey Experiment Station issued last year. The eggs for the hatch which is quoted were brought for a large poultry farm whose birds have the reputation of being vigorous, and good egg producers. The eggs were produced by yearling hens, and set in a big sectional incubator on January 19th, 1914, and seven hundred chicks hatched out on February 9th. They were placed in a pipe-heated brooder house, and kept there until they were twelve weeks old. Some were lost through crowding, toe picking, and other accidental causes. At from nine to twelve weeks of age the cockerels were sold alive as broilers, the average weight being a little over one pound. The market was average for the season, the price being fifty-eight cents a pound. This resulted in a very attractive return in cash, and shows one of the advantages which may be secured from bringing off considerable number of chicks early in the spring. Approximately 300 pullets were put on range at twelve weeks of age, or about the first week in May.

The chicks in the brooder were fed the regular N. J. State brooding rations, consisting of dry mash and cracked grains, with bone and skim-milk being fed. These two ingredients are specially mentioned as they seem specially desirable at this early season to induce a rapid growth, for rapid maturity is what we are after. On range they are fed a grain ration of equal parts of wheat and cracked corn and dry mash in large hoppers always before them. The mash contained ten per cent of high grade meat scrap, and ten per cent of dry ground bone. Skim-milk was not fed on range. The first egg was found on the range the 10th of July, just five months from the time of hatching. From this date on the flock, as a whole commenced to mature, and on the 29th of July they were placed in their permanent laying quarters and gotten into shape for an early production.

The house provided for them was of the New Jersey Multiple Unit type twenty feet deep by forty feet long. Two hundred birds were selected as being the most uniform in development and of good size and maturity. From the time that these birds were placed in their permanent quarters until the next fall, or until August, 1915, they were never let out of their house, so yards were provided, and all green food, together with all nourishment, was provided in the house.

The birds were fed the standard N. J. State Rations. The dry mash consisting of

Two hundred pounds of wheat bran, two hundred pounds of wheat middlings, one hundred pounds of round oats, one hundred pounds of corn-meal, one hundred pounds of gluten meal, one hundred pounds of ground Alfalfa, two hundred pounds of high grade meat scrap.

Was fed in large hoppers, the birds having access to it at all times. This mash was supplemented by a morning scratch feed consisting of equal parts of wheat and oats, which was fed in deep litter at the rate of one pound to ten birds. Special care was exercised, to see that the litter was always in a dry, coarse clean condition. At, or just before noon, a considerable quantity of mangel beets, or at various times sprouted oats, were fed, all being given at a feeding which the birds would eat up in one hour. In the afternoon a night scratch ration was given, consisting of:

Two hundred pounds of cracked corn, one hundred pounds of wheat, one hundred pounds of oats, one hundred pounds of buckwheat.

In addition to these standard grain rations a constant supply of fresh, clean water was kept before them all of the time, and during most of the period sour skim-milk was fed in large pans, all they would drink being given. The milk seemed to be very valuable, and was in part responsible for the excellent showing of the pen.

The flock commenced laying well soon after being placed in permanent quarters, and continued to give a good account of themselves at all times except during their moult, which took place in November, December and January. The number of eggs laid during the year, the per cent production, the value of eggs, cost of food, and resulting profit or loss by months is shown on the accompanying table. It will be seen that the total flock, which averaged for the year 190 birds, laid a grand total of 26,280 eggs, or 138 eggs per bird average for the twelve months period. This means an average per cent production for the period of 35. The total value of the eggs produced was $679.30, the eggs being marketed in most part, wholesale in New York City. The value of the eggs was in all cases figured on wholesale New York quotations for first grade white eggs. The total cost of all food consumed, including the skim-milk, which cost $9.00, was $257.53. The skim-milk was figured at the rate of 25 cents for a 40-quart can, which is the creamery price for the product in New Jersey. The profits are shown for each month, and it is interesting to note that during only one month did the flock not pay for its feed. This was during December, or during the height of the moult. The total profit for the year above feed was therefore $421.83. This means a net profit above feed for each bird of $2.22.

In determining the net profit from each venture the labor cost and interest charges must of course be deducted. After substracting these figures the results would then show a net return of about $1.85 per bird, which is attained through the production of nothing but market eggs. This figure does not include the increased revenue obtained from the sale of the surplus cockerels, as broilers, at a time when very fancy prices were secured, nor does it include increased returns which were secured from the sale of many of the eggs from this flock in the spring for hatching purposes.

A. O.—You don't say how old the hens are, or how you feed, so it is difficult to tell what has caused the trouble, which appears to be liver complaint. If you have been feeding much corn, reduce the quantity. Give them mash in the morning, made of two parts finely chopped clover or Alfalfa hay which has been steamed for several hours, or ground oats and wheat. Don't give them more than they will eat up clean in ten minutes. At night scatter mixed grain, oats, Kafir corn and wheat in deep litter, so they will have to scratch for every kernel. Add one teaspoonful of sulphate of magnesia to every pint of drinking water, one day a week until they have had three doses.

M. C. H.—I really can't guess what the trouble is with your birds, especially as you say neighbors are losing chickens in the same way. The only suggestion I can offer is that the birds get into fields where there is ripening broom grass or milo maize, and eat unthreshed grain. I have been told by several correspondents that the hulls of the new milo maize grain seems to irritate the intestines and cause

New and Unusual in Fruits and Flowers

IT is the unusual that always attracts. We pass by "old-fashioned" plants without giving them a moment's thought, but the instant we see some new or unusual one we stop and begin to wonder what it is. Plant breeders, horticulturists and seedsmen are continually at work upon the improvement of plants, hence something new or improved is likely to appear at any time.

How New Plants are Created

Not many years ago people regarded with suspicion the man who dared assert that an old plant could be improved or a new one created, but today we have so many visible evidences of this fact that it is no longer occasion for doubt. Every new creation in plant life makes us pause and wonder how it all came about. This is how it happens: There are two ways in which it may be done,—by crossing and by selection.

Crossing

Two plants are selected that have desirable qualities. Let us suppose that one has size and the other color, for example. It is desired to get the size of the first combined with the color of the second. These two plants are crossed, that is, the pollen from one is applied to the pistil of the other. This is a process that requires great skill and care, but the result is seed. These seeds are sown the next year. Many plants are produced; some resemble one parent, some the other; perhaps one or two resemble both parents. Size and color have been combined. These are allowed to go to seed and the seeds planted the second year. Some of these plants revert—that is they turn back—so that they resemble the original parents, but many "come true." By continuing this process of selection for six or seven years these seeds always "come true" and are ready to be placed on the market.

Improvement by Selection

In every field or garden can be found some plants better than the rest. These are chosen as parent stock. By planting their seeds year after year, saving only the seeds from the best plants, the original stock can be greatly improved. It takes six or seven years, often much longer, to produce substantial improvement by this method.

Sports

It sometimes happens that plants change character so greatly as to be wholly unlike the parent stock. Everybody is familiar with the striper or white corn-stalks. These are called "sports." If "sports" are taken as parent stock and selections carefully made for several years new varieties are produced.

The polled-Durham cattle were produced in this way. A man living in the state of Minnesota had a Durham cow with horns that gave birth to twin calves, both heifers. Neither of them developed horns. Another farmer in Ohio had a young Durham bull without horns. These animals were mated and the polled-Durham breed of cattle is the result. Burbank produced his spineless cactus and his white blackberry in exactly the same way.

Where to Get New or Improved Plants

As soon as a plant is improved it is usually sold to seedsmen and dealers in nursery stock for dissemination. These are the best sources from which to secure new creations. One should study the advertisements in farm papers if he wishes to secure new and unusual varieties. Some of them are advertised directly but the majority of them are to be found listed in the pages of the catalogues issued by the seed and nursery houses. If you fail to find mention of new creations in their advertisements, the next step is to send for their catalogues and study these pages. The reliable dealer—and most seedsmen and nurserymen are reliable—can be trusted to give an accurate description of the plant and fairly set forth its special claim to your attention in his advertisement or in the pages of his regular catalogue.

Cheaper Horse Feeding

While it is a mistake to make any very sudden change in the ration of the work horse, it can be done gradually without danger. Many get into the habit or routine of giving horses the same ration fed by their fathers and grandfathers for the reason that they have found that diet to be satisfactory, so far as the horse is concerned; but a little figuring may show that the old ration is not now economical.

Whole oats cannot be excelled perhaps as an all-round horse feed but we find that it is being wastefully used in the winter season as is hay. When horses are working hard the oat ration, together with a small quantity of wheat bran at each feed gives excellent results, but when horses are idle or doing light work in winter it is possible to reduce the expensive feed yet maintain the animals in good condition. Oat straw may well take the place of the expensive hay, if some bright corn fodder can be added. Old, weathered corn fodder or corn fodder that is moldy is absolutely unfit as feed for horses and often proves deadly. In very cold weather oats may be withheld altogether and ear corn with oat straw and a little hay or fodder substituted. If roots, such as carrots, parsnips or rutabagas can be supplied as an adjunct feed, the horses will show benefit in the condition of their coats.

But what we particularly wish to recommend here is that "blackstrap," New Orleans or cane sugar molasses, should be considered as a horse feed whenever it can be bought at a reasonable figure. It is very readily digested, does not cause colic or scours and quickly plumps a thin, harness-galled work horse. A quart of molasses mixed with three quarts of hot water and then stirred thoroughly with corn meal, wheat bran and cut hay, or cut oat straw, fed night and morning, will work wonders in a thin horse. It may be found necessary to starve the horse at first to take the molassed feed but he will soon take it with relish and show improvement. When such a ration is fed night and morning to a hard-worked horse it is usual to feed whole oats at noon and long hay at night. The idle work horse need scarcely have any grain if fed molasses, cut hay and bright fodder. Sound corn silage may also be safely fed in small quantities to the idle horse in winter, but not in combination with molasses. Corn and Alfalfa hay make a balanced ration but are expensive at present as are most of the usual grain feeds, but molasses and straw should help to cheapen the ration and yet give good results.

Economy in Feeding

With wheat nearing the $2.00 mark, corn at $1.00, and other grains in proportion, one naturally finds that mill feed also has soared in price. Stockmen consequently have been at their wit's end to figure how to make ends meet in turning feed into marketable produce such as meat, milk, cream and butter. One result of the perplexing problem has been the flooding of the late fall and early winter markets with "she stuff" of indifferent quality.

Dairymen, trying to economize, have marketed every heifer and cow that failed to pay her board and return a fair profit in produce. Such cattle have sold around three or four cents a pound and averaging not much in excess of 800 pounds per head have failed to pay the cost of their production. Still it has been good policy to sell them. If retained, they would have "eaten their heads off" at the present price of feed and the heifer calves they might have produced would not have been worth raising, while vealing calves just now is not very profitable so far as dairy cattle are concerned. Calves also have gone to market in great numbers and not in the best of condition, while light pigs, around 100 to 125 pounds, have also glutted the market.

The high price of corn has been a chief factor in forcing unfinished hogs into the market, while other causes have been fear of cholera and, in some districts the fact that late corn was caught by an early frost and ruined for feeding purposes. It remains as a certainty that dollar corn cannot be profitably fed to heavy hogs and those too are being marketed as quickly as possible.

The high price of feed will more quickly than any other influence teach farmers who in the past have been indifferent the need of certain sensible changes in the business management of the farm.

Here are some of the things that they must recognize and put into practise if they are to succeed:

1. The cheapest made gains in animals for marketing are the growth gains while the animal is young. Recognizing this fact, everything possible should be done to induce rapid growth or development in colts, calves, pigs and lambs. Too often these youngsters are stunted by spare feeding and having to fight flies on bare, unshaded pastures where drinking water is inadequate. The stunted beast never proves profitable. Forced feeding later in life, to make up for lost opportunity, is expensive and profitless. All stunted young animals should be got rid of as soon as possible.

2. The most profitable young animal is the one that is out of a profitable dam and pure bred sire from profitable stock. If a man is going to make veal calves his specialty, he should use a sire that will beget calves that are large at birth and possessed of the ability to lay on calf flesh quickly. Such calves only come from large, thrifty cows. It does not pay to veal little calves from small dairy cows. Nor does it pay to raise stock for market from scrub sows, ewes or mares.

It is not a difficult or very expensive matter to substitute fast developing hogs for the runs and razor-backs too commonly owned in many districts. From such stocks spring pigs may be made to weigh several hundred pounds by November and this quickly grown pork is profitable. The winter feeding of runts that only weigh 75 to 100 pounds in late fall is a losing proposition. So, too, the colt from the right sort of sire and dam will have grown fast while suckling and by the time it is 12 months old should weigh from 1,000 to 1,200 pounds. There is an appreciative market for such colts.

3. The foolish and wasteful practise of boarding robber cows should be abandoned everywhere and heifer calves from such cows had better be knocked in the head at birth than raised for dairy purposes. It only pays to keep and raise the heifer calf of a cow that averages at least one pound of butter fat a day throughout her lactation period. The one-pound-of-butter-fat-a-day cow is now being sought after by every sensible dairyman and a herd of such cows never can come from scrub cows and a scrub bull.

More than ever before it is necessary to breed and feed animals that are of the best possible kind and family for production. If that policy is not followed feeding will be done at a loss wherever attempted.

A Critical Time for Ewes

Success at lambing time is very largely dependent upon the proper management of ewes in winter and especially during January and February when snow is likely to be deep and the temperature low. There are two fundamental facts to be remembered in the successful management of the pregnant ewe, viz.:

1. Exercise and 2. Activiy of the bowels.

Ewes of the mutton breeds fatten readily, laying on much inside fat and becoming sluggish and constipated. Lack of exercise helps to induce condition and errors in feeding complete the mischief. To enforce exercise it is a good plan to spread the hay for the ewes over the surface of a big field at a distance from the stables and make the ewes walk there and back daily. If the snow is deep a home-made snow plow will quickly open up the narrow path needed by the sheep. Some of the most successful sheepmen make their ewes walk a mile to get their hay and then scatter over a large field while feeding and walk home a mile for shelter. But exercise alone will not suffice. Thousands of ewes are killed each winter by feeding them nothing but coarse dry, woody swale or Timothy hay, threshed clover hay, or other coarse, bulky forage. It is imperative that the pregnant ewe should be allowed good clover or Alfalfa hay and in addition two pounds of roots or sound corn silage daily to regulate the bowels. It also is customary to feed a small quantity of whole oats and wheat bran and to allow some shelled corn in very cold weather, but the most important matter is to enforce exercise and keep the bowels active.

If the paunch of the ewe is kept distended with the objectionable roughage we have mentioned, the liver becomes overtaxed and diseased, partial paralysis of the muscles of the stomach sets in and chronic constipation results with injurious pressure upon the womb. If the ewe does not die in this condition it is certain that she will have difficulty in lambing, dead or puny lambs or lack of milk. These troubles are incurable but easily prevented as we have shown.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming.

Questions and Answers

BARLEY AND CLOVER.—I am much interested in the combination of barley and clover crops. Please tell me how to prepare the soil, how much seed to the acre, at what time to plant and when to harvest; also what and how is the best use to be made of barley as feed? B. A., Dexter, Ind.

A.—Prepare the land as for corn and sow one and one half to two bushels of barley to the acre. The land must be clean, rich and well drained. A warm friable loam is best and as a rule it is not wise to seed to barley unless that crop is commonly grown in the district. Barley is sold for the making of malt, or is ground and fed to hogs as a part ration, or rolled and made a small part of a horse's ration. Barley hay is the staple horse feed in some Pacific coast states. Seed when the weather is settled just after oat seeding. Seed two pounds of red medium clover with the barley to be used as fall pasture for stock, and plow under as green manure.

RAISING SUNFLOWERS.—I was much interested in the article on the "Cultivation of the Sunflower" in November COMFORT. Can you tell me where I can get a book on the raising of sunflowers, and where I can get sunflower seed suitable to grow in this (Wisconsin) climate? I presume an early variety would be required for this locality. Will they do well on new land with light sandy soil? I have ten acres I can plant to sunflowers next spring, if advisable. D. S., Stanley, Wis.

A.—The best bulletin on sunflower cultivation is by Dr. Harvey W. Wiley. It is Bulletin No. 60, Bureau of Chemistry, U. S. Department of Agriculture, and is entitled "The Sunflower, Its Cultivation, Composition and Uses." It may be had free by making application to your senator or representative in Congress, now in session at Washington, D. C. Write him at once and he will see that you get it. According to this bulletin sunflowers do best on a rich loam soil and require about the same kind of fertility and cultivation as does corn. Search the catalogs of the leading seed houses for sunflower seed advertisements. Also write to Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., and to Agricultural Experiment Station in your own state for further advice regarding seed.

SUNFLOWERS AS A CROP.—Please tell me about raising sunflowers as a field crop. What kind would do best in Montana? When and how to plant, distance between rows, where to get the right seed, the kind of seeds to be used, and where could I sell my crop are questions I would like answered, as I want to plant fifteen acres to sunflowers next spring if it would be a profitable crop. MRS. J. D., Lewistown, Mont.

A.—See answer to D. S., above. The Russian variety is considered the best. Plant and cultivate in drills, the same as for corn. Plant early in spring as soon as the ground can be worked. St. Louis is one of the leading markets for this seed. Write to your State (Montana) Experiment Station for special information and advice regarding success of sunflowers as a field crop in your locality. We advise our readers living in districts where sunflowers are not cultivated as a field crop, to ascertain whether this crop would succeed in their localities before venturing on any extensive planting. This advice applies equally to any untried crop.

WHAT ABOUT SUNFLOWERS.—I read your interesting article of "Raising Sunflowers" and I want more information on the subject. Please tell when to plant, what kind of seed and how many pounds to the acre. Where is the seed to be obtained, and where can the crop be sold? MARGARET E. K., Toronto, Kans.

A.—Sunflower seeds are planted in the spring as soon as the ground can be worked, just before corn planting time, from four to six pounds per acre being used, according to size of seed. There are three principal varieties,—the common, the black giant and the mammoth Russian. The Russian is preferred. See answers to D. S. and Mrs. J. D., above.

BRINE FOR HAMS AND BACON.—Pease tell me how to make a brine for hams and bacon. One of the "Sisters" told me the recipe had been published in COMFORT, but I missed it. MRS. H. T., Sonoma City, Cal.

A.—See article entitled "Pickled Pork," page 16, December number of COMFORT'S Modern Farmer.

SALTING PORK.—I have a large hog to be killed and salted for winter use. Please tell just how to do it and the proportion of salt to use per weight of meat. LEONA P., Baldwin, La.

A.—Your question is also answered in article referred to above. See December number.

Uncle Charlie's Home Fund

START the new year right by presenting a brick to the birthday fund to provide Uncle Charlie a home.

He reports an increase of $51.00, bringing the total received prior to December first up to $388.00 contributed by only 382 members of the great COMFORT family numbering millions that have been benefited and inspired by his humanizing and Christianizing work.

The movement to raise this fund was started by our readers through their letters to the Sisters' Corner. At first I was reluctant to print these apeals for fear the results might disappoint the expectations of the promotors of the project, for the masses are seldom loyal and grateful to their benefactors to the extent of rewarding them in any substantial form.

But now that it has been undertaken and publicly announced, Uncle Charlie, who has sacrificed so much for others, should not be submitted to the humiliation of its turning out a fizzle. The responsibility rests on his friends, thousands of whom have been profuse in their written expressions of love and admiration, to give him something more substantial and convincing than mere lip service. If each would give according to his or her means, be it ever so little, the sum total would attain a magnitude that would honor him and reflect credit on them.

He does not desire a contribution from anyone that does not wish to help. But if each acts on the theory that his mite is not needed and will not be missed the entire project to provide a home for Uncle Charlie will result in ignominious failure. He is in the hands of his friends.

The third day of February it will be twenty years since Uncle Charlie suffered the affliction that has made him a helpless, bedridden shut-in. I hope the advent of that anniversary will see his benefit fund assume respectable proportions.

Again let me remind you how you can help:

1. By cash donations.
2. By purchasing Uncle Charlie's books (see advertisement.)
3. Those who cannot spare the money for a cash donation or for purchase of his books can contribute by getting subscriptions to COMFORT in aid of the "Uncle Charlie Benefit Fund" and instead of taking the club premium or cash commission themselves direct that it be credited to the fund. In such cases I will pay over to Uncle Charlie one half of the subscription price of all subscriptions sent for this purpose. The regular cash commission on COMFORT subscriptions is 40 per cent, but for Uncle Charlie's Benefit Fund I will allow 50 per cent. Another way to help him and benefit yourself is to get up a subscription club and take one of his books as your premium.

In one or other of these ways every COMFORT reader who wishes to do so can help swell the fund for Uncle Charlie which has my hearty approval and will have my assistance within the limits of propriety.

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

gest men we have in the land, not pap hunting lawyer politicians, but scientists, savants, and experts and we have hundreds of them. Let these advise the Minister of Welfare and Congress as to what steps shall be taken to promote the welfare of our citizens, to raise living and thinking to higher standards and inaugurate an era of justice and real prosperity that would automatically abolish poverty, illiteracy, unemployment, drunkenness, vice, crime, saloons and brothels, hyphenated citizens and soreheads and anarchists and give us a country full of loyal, happy, intellectual people, ready to fight for right, righteousness, democracy and freedom not only in this land, but in any other land where humanity might call for assistance—and real genuine dyed-in-the-wool Americanism might be needed. Now get together, stick together and pull together. Read, study discuss, fraternize and organize. The best "ism" and greatest need of the country right now is Americanism. Make that word your rallying cry and the basis of all your ideals. Do that and you will have started the New Year right. Do that and 1917 will mark a new epoch in the upward and onward march of a nation which should be first in all noble projects and would be first if you'd only highly resolve to make it so.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

DUDLEY, IDAHO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am so far away that some of you may think that I am almost out of the United States, but you may locate me way up in northern Idaho, along the Coeur d'Alene river valley. My home is in the valley just below the mouth of Fourth of July Creek canyon. This creek was named in 1861. A detachment of soldiers were on their way into the Coeur d'Alene country to fight the Indians and they spent July Fourth along the headwaters of this creek and named it Fourth of July Creek. They blazed a large white pine tree and carved the date on it. These figures are still plain and may easily be read.

Through this canyon and across my ranch runs the only cross country road to be found through the mountains of northern Idaho. This wagon road connects the Pacific northwest country with the states to the eastward, and naturally there is a great deal of travel this way. Last year because of the Panama Pacific Exposition and because the war in Europe forced most of our rich people to spend their money at home there was a great deal more automobile travel through here than there ever was in a single year before.

We see people of most all classes and conditions, from the aristocrat to the homeless, drifting American workingmen.

On Jan. 1st., 1916, state-wide prohibition laws went into effect in Idaho and Washington. The liquor interests will be scheming to get a chance to have these states voted wet again as soon as they can get enough petitioners to have the question brought up to be voted on again. I will welcome the day, and try to hasten it too, when we will have Nation-wide prohibition.

You wanted to know what we were doing to make this old world a better place in which to live. I am using my vote, my influence, as well as some of my money to the end that the cause of righteousness, liberty and justice may triumph, and that we may learn to live in the relationship toward each other in which God intended we should live. (God bless you for that Earl. Wish there were more like you.—Uncle Charlie.)

As my letter is quite long I must close. Shall be glad to hear from some of the cousins. With love to all,

EARL J. BYRNE. (League No. 40,001.)

Earl J. Bryne's League number is 40,001. Earl joined us in February of last year. Several thousand have joined the League since then, and if a few more of you will come forward we will soon have fifty thousand. Quite an army, don't you think? I know just where you are located Earl, and could almost walk to the spot blindfolded. It's an ill wind that blows no one any good and the war by keeping people at home has made vast numbers who know no more of their country than a blind pig knows of heaven, acquainted with the many wonders of the great land they live in. I thank God that before I was cut down I had a chance to see and know Uncle Sam's domain thoroughly and completely. It is an open book to me. Those who live in this country and who have never been out of the little valley in which they have been reared have my sincerest sympathy. Before long we shall have universal military service. We've got to come to it whether we like it or not. There will be an awful howl go up when that day arrives. I suggest however, if Uncle Sam wants recruits for his armies, every year he should give a quarter of a million of the brightest of his boys an excursion trip that would take in all the scenic wonders of this wonderful land. Let the Eastern boys go West, let the Western boys come East. Let them see Niagara, Plymouth Rock, Jamestown, St. Augustine, Washington, the Yellowstone National Park, Glacier Park, Puget Sound and its big towering mountain sentinels, the Rockies, the Sierras, the Yosemite and the big trees, the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, the scenic beauties of Colorado and the great lakes. Let them see it all. Make it a part of their training and education. Do that and we shall have no more German-Americans, Irish-Americans, British-Americans, Scandinavian-Americans, Italian-Americans or any other of the hyphenated breed. We should have genuine, dyed-in-the-wool, hundred per cent Americans, loving their country and glorying in it. Before we ask people to fight, let them see what they are fighting for. There would be no political bums in Congress if the young men and women of our nation had the proper education. The way to get an education is not to stick your nose in a book, but to go and see the things the book tells you about. That kind of an education might be costly but it wouldn't be one fiftieth part as costly as our present system which teaches nothing or next to nothing, and does not even succeed in giving a boy the faintest idea of the grandeur and glory of the country he lives in or make him even attached or devoted to his motherland. The great trouble in this world is that few people have that wonderful gift, imagination. Without imagination they can only grasp what they can see, and like your Missourian they won't believe anything until they see it. They are like the farmer who went to the circus. After staring at the giraffe for half an hour, he came to the conclusion that "There ain't no sich animile." Most people spend their lives gazing at a clapboard house that looks like a dry-goods box with the pip, plentifully sprinkled with tomato cans and broken bottles, then when you picture to them a continent three thousand miles broad, a mountain peak covered with eternal snow, and a canyon thousands of feet deep and ten miles broad, they look you in the eye and grunt: "There ain't no sich animile!" What is the result? These people do not believe in protecting our shores for most of them don't believe we've got any. They have no patriotism, no nationalism, no pride of race, no soul. They have stuck in a rut until they are dying of dry rot. If you tried to pull them out of the rut if they didn't bite your hand for attempting the job, they would fall to pieces as you yanked them out. Incidentally they will tell you that books are "pizen" and reading an invention of the devil. The cure for these people is a peep at their own country. If they tell you that it's Rockefeller's country and not theirs, tell them if that is so, Rockefeller showed good sense in swiping it, while they showed stupidity in letting him do it. A country will always belong to the other fellow when the majority of people prefer ignorance to knowledge, sloth to action and stick like prairie dogs in miserable holes as did their cave-dwelling ancestors tens of thousands of years ago. Well we can't do much with the grown ups, but I do hope that Uncle Sam will consider my suggestion and make a knowledge of this country a part of the education of the brightest youth of our land. Please note the soldiers had to go into this portion of Idaho and fight the Indians and make the country safe for settlers to work and live in. This was another disgraceful exhibition of militarism and I trust all the peace-at-any-price fanatics will at once gather at their locals and hold meetings of protest. People who do not believe in armies or navies or what they ignorantly and foolishly call militarism, but which is only plain common-sense protection to life and property, have no right to take advantage of the militarism that made the West habitable and secure. By the way, if it were not for this awful militarism as they call it the whole bunch of us would be over in Europe right now, eating wind pies and fried dog shadows, or dying in the trenches for Kings, Kaisers, Czars and Emperors, etc. Earl, I'd get out of that canyon if I were you. It must be awful to live in a country that has been polluted by the presence of those dreadful militarist soldiers, so much nicer, better and healthier to be killed by Indians than to have the protection of "militarism."

6703-25-67 N. W., SEATTLE, WASH.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl of thirteen and have tried my skill in writing the composition which I send you. I would like to know if it is suitable for my age.

I am in the seventh grade.

Yours truly, ROSE SPRINTLS.

The Falling Rose Petals

BY ROSE SPRINTLS

It is spring, the birdies sing,
And the flowers sweetly bloom:
Among the flowers of the spring,
The sweet scented roses are the best of all;
They are falling on the moss covered ground.
Many little hands are held out to greet them,
Many fair faces come to scent them
Many little feet trot under its bushes,
At last! when the sumer is ore the sweet scented blossoms fall,
They cover old mother earth with the fragrence of sweet blossoms.

Rose, that is some address of yours. It looks like a section of an astronomical calculation. I should think if you took all those numbers and shook them up twice you'd know how many old maids there were on Mars and also exactly when Haley's comet was going to put in its next appearance. Your potery contribution Rose, has been read with a great deal of interest. Being a Rose yourself, you naturally would write about roses. Billy the Goat says he belongs to the rose family, because he went to bed yesterday and later on arose. Though your pottery has reason, it is sadly lacking in rhyme. Now why didn't you write your first four lines something like this:

It is spring, the birdies sing,
And the flowers sweetly bloom,
The butterfly is on the wing,
And roses burst their wint'ry tomb.

If I had been you I think I would have had it go something like this:

It is spring, the birdies sing,
The skeeter is sharpening up his sting,
The high cost of living makes money take wing,
And sulphur and 'lasses are now the thing.
Last year's straw hat from the attic we bring,
And swat the flies as they start to cling
To baby's bald head, bing, bing, bing.

You being a poetess Rose, or a potteryess, would naturally scorn to write jingle of this flippant character. There is one line in your pottery Rose that has got me quite excited. You say "When the sumer is ore." Now Rose what is a sumer? I've heard of a consumer, but I've never seen a sumer. I used to be a consumer and so did the Goat and Maria, but when steak got to thirty dollars a pint and eggs a thousand bucks apiece we tightened up our belts and quit eating. We are saving up to buy a potato. We've got fifty-seven dollars so far. Perhaps when we get another fifty dollars we may be able to buy half a one. Billy and Pete, our two canaries, are looking worried. Well they may. We are thinking of converting them into song bird hash. We've got to live. The Goat thinks you mean summer instead of sumer, Rose. I, however, am not so sure of that, as the summer could not be ore. The dictionary says that ore is a natural substance, part of a rock containing metal. Now I don't think you would be mean enough to convert our beautiful summers into a bunch of dilapidated old rocks. That would be dreadful. I think you meant o'er, which is an abbreviation for over, instead of ore.

Many little hands are held out to greet them,
Many fair faces come to scent them.

I think I would have written those lines thus:

Many little hands are held out to greet them,
And as living's so high the kids start to eat them.

There is more truth than poetry in that, and after all truth is more important than poetry or pottery either. Your last two lines in which you attempt to rhyme fall with blossoms is excruciating. I would have written it thus:

At last the sweet scented blossoms fall,
Covering the earth with a fragrant pall.
Now dear I'll quit this critical prattle,
And say adieu to fair Rose of Seattle.

WHISTLER, ALA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Will you please tell me through the columns of your paper the COMFORT, name of a medicine you said was useful in ejecting gas from the stomach. Do you know of a good remedy for indigestion? Sister has it very bad. She has tried doctors but they do her no good. Sister does not digest anything. She has to try anything anyone tells her. (God help her if she does.—Uncle Charlie.)

I am a subscriber to COMFORT and enjoy reading your interesting letters. Trusting you will advise me,

Your friend, LULA ECKERT.

As so many people suffer from stomach trouble, Lulu, I will answer your letter through the columns of COMFORT, then perhaps thousands may benefit from what I have to say instead of one. Most stomach trouble is caused by the vile habit so many people have of bolting their food, as though they were animals instead of humans. People still think their teeth are in their stomachs, instead of their mouths. No food should go into the stomach until it has been reduced to a pulp. About seventy-five per cent of the meat in this country is wretched stuff, tough, indigestible, and as a rule badly cooked. When people start bolting that kind of stuff there is bound to be trouble. Don't swallow the fiber of anything if you have a troublesome stomach. Chew your food thoroughly, and if you find fibrous matter remains that will not be reduced to a pulp, just place your fork to your lips and remove it. This can be done without violation of table manners. We don't swallow fish bones and cherry stones, why then swallow meat fiber? It is a poor stomach indeed that cannot digest food that has been thoroughly masticated. Every morning of

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasoline engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed.

Grinding in the Valves

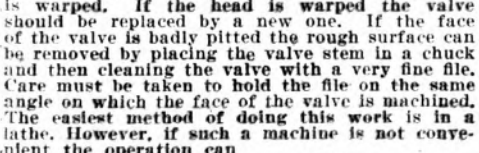
AFTER a season's run the valve faces are apt to become worn so that they do not properly register with their seats. This condition will result in loss of compression. Usually the exhaust valves are the worst offenders for the reason that they are subject to intense heat. A valve is nothing more or less than a gate or door for admitting the combustible gas into or the burnt gas out of the cylinder. The location of the valves in a motor is a matter of choice on the part of the engine designer. In some motors all valves are located on one side, in others the intake valves are on one side and the exhaust valves on the other while some motors have the valves located in the heads of the cylinders.

REMOVING KEY FROM UNDER VALVE SPRING SO THAT VALVE CAN BE TAKEN OUT.

If the exhaust valves do not properly seat there will be a loss of compression and power and a very weakening effect upon the mixture. If the inlet valves are not seating properly there will also be a lack of compression and frequent shootings of flame through the carburetor. This condition is commonly referred to as backfires. In either case the remedy is to grind the valves and valve seats to fit. Usually the instruction book furnished with the car incorporates much advice concerning the grinding of valves. Nevertheless too much attention cannot be given this subject as it is often amusing to the mechanic to watch an owner attempt to reseat a valve.

The designer of an engine always makes provision for the removal of a valve. Sometimes a valve can be got at by removing the cylinder head while at other times it is necessary to take off caps in the cylinder head. After removing the necessary parts to make the valve head visible the first step is to remove the key or pin that retains the valve spring. For the person who has never removed one of these keys the work is likely to prove somewhat perplexing. A suitable tool must be used for raising the valve spring so that the key can be taken out. When the key is removed it is a simple matter to remove the valve spring and then the valve. One of the commonest mistakes committed is the attempting to reseat a valve that is badly pitted or the head is warped. If the head is warped the valve should be replaced by a new one. If the face of the valve is badly pitted the rough surface can be removed by placing the valve stem in a chuck and then cleaning the valve with a very fine file. Care must be taken to hold the file on the same angle on which the face of the valve is machined. The easiest method of doing this work is in a lathe. However, if such a machine is not convenient the operation can be done with an ordinary bit brace.

CLEANING VALVE FACE WITH VERY FINE FILE AND BIT BRACE.

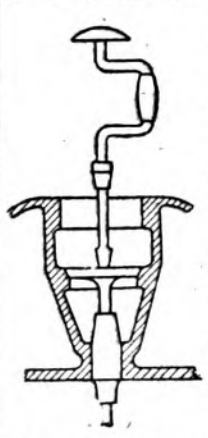


The majority of valves are recessed in the top center of the head this having been the support for the valve forging when the same was originally machined in the lathe. When a bit brace is used this recess can be used for a support when filing as shown in the illustration.

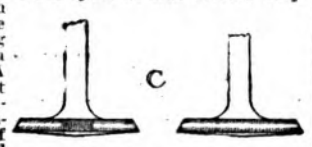
After making certain that the valve face is true examine the head of valve to determine whether it is slotted or drilled with two small holes. If the head is slotted a screw-driver bit may be used for turning the valve during the grinding operation. If two holes are drilled in the head a special grinding tool must be used. A tool for this purpose resembles a two-pronged fork. See illustration 1.

To reseat a valve it is necessary to have the valve lifter at the bottom. This can be determined by turning the motor over by hand until the lifter rises and then goes down. The grinding should first be done with a mixture of oil and emery or some preparation made especially for this work. A good surface can be imparted to the valve face by finishing the operation with a mixture of oil and ground glass. Before beginning the work it is advisable to place a piece of waste or cloth in the opening of the combustion chamber so as to prevent any emery from reaching the bore of the cylinder. Apply only a small amount of the abrasive to the valve at one time.

Very slight pressure should be exerted on the grinding tool and only half turns should be made, first in one direction and then the other. During the grinding operation one is apt to become impatient and exert considerable pressure on the tool. Do not exert heavy pressure for the reason that the valve face and seat are apt to become scored or cut. Such a condition will make it almost impossible to seat the valve so that it will hold compression. Clean and wipe the valve face and seat often and note the extent of the bright line which will appear. When the valve is beginning to seat the bright line will appear irregular and broken. However, when this condition exists the valve is not properly seated and the grinding operation must be continued. When the valve is properly ground into its seat the bright line will appear for the full circumference of the valve face. See illustration C.



After making sure that the valves are properly ground it will be well to examine the valve spring. To prevent rapid wear of the valve guide and stem it is necessary that the ends of spring be true. This can be determined by placing the spring on a flat surface and noting that when so placed the spring stands perfectly upright. Turn the spring over and note that the same condition exists. Should the spring have a tendency to stand off at an angle the end should be squared up on an emery grinder. After putting the valves back make sure that there is a clearance of about the thickness of an ordinary name card between valve stem and valve lifter when the valves are fully closed. As all valves do not close at the same time it will be necessary to turn the motor over by hand and test each valve separately. As a rule valve lifters are made adjustable so that this distance can be obtained.



TWO TYPES OF TOOLS TO TURN VALVES WHEN GRINDING.

Points to be Considered in Buying a Car

This is the time of the year when the motor world is looking forward to the large automobile shows which are to take place in all the large cities. The person who has any intentions of purchasing a car for the coming season will invariably visit at least one of these exhibits and before leaving is apt to decide on the car which in his opinion meets his requirements. The purpose of this article is not to discriminate but place the facts clearly before the prospective purchaser so that when he possesses the car he may have joy instead of regrets. The first point to strike the layman's eye is beauty. This is but natural but beauty does not give service and therefore one must first open the cover and go deeper. First decide definitely the amount of money which one is willing to invest and then view the cars which are priced within that limit. Next consider the nature of work which is required of the car. Estimate roughly the amount of money that must be spent for the upkeep and maintenance of the machine. Don't allow any silver-tongued salesman to convince you that the initial cost is the last. True it is that the car does not eat hay and grain nor occasionally require the services of a veterinarian but there are other things which must be bought for the machine. Instead of hay, grain and water the car needs gasoline and oil. In view of the high price of gasoline consider seriously the car that is economical in the consumption of this fuel. Next consider the tires, tire repairs, etc. A car that is heavy in weight wears out the tires quickest. Then there is the matter of service. By this term is meant a reliable manufacturer and nearby dealer who thinks just as much about keeping the car on the road as he does of accepting the profit from the sale. A slight accident may easily render the car inoperative and if parts or a good mechanic cannot be obtained readily it is necessary to keep the car idle for a considerable period. Cars are bought to run not stand idle. To consult a friend who owns a car of the same make you intend to buy before purchasing is in most instances time well spent.

GRINDING IN VALVE BY USE OF BIT BRACE.

The Truck on the Farm

"Is the motor truck more economical for the farmer than the horse?" is a question frequently asked. If the farmer has sufficient work it is the honest opinion of the writer that the truck is the more economical in the end. Let us first consider that the latest statistics available show that the average farm horse only actually works approximately three and one half hours per day. This means that he eats 10 pounds of food for every hour of labor. Consider harness, wagons, horseshoes, care, etc. Some advocates of the motor truck have gone so far as to state that man works for the horse instead of the horse working for the man. They advance the following data proof: One horse consumes in a year approximately 12,000 pounds of food which is the equivalent of the harvest from five acres. The horseshoes used in this country contain enough iron to build 40,000 average motor trucks. They next consider the number of street cleaners, wagon builders, harness makers, veterinarians, whip makers, food planters, reapers and machinery builders. The horse when idle must be fed and cared for while the truck if idle incurs no expense. Edison is credited with once saying that the horse is the poorest motor ever built. He advises that if the horse was built of metal like the gas engine, he would require no more space than the ordinary soap box. By this he no doubt wishes to infer that the horse is out of proportion when considering the amount of work he does. The amount of work that the horse can do is limited to a few hours each day while on the other hand the motor truck stands ready to work for man 24 hours each day and seven days a week if necessary. The speed of the horse decreases as the hours of his labor increases while the speed of the truck remains the same regardless of the length of time used, and you do not have to favor it on a scorching hot day.

Polishing Mud Guards

As a rule mud guards or fenders as they are usually termed are not finished in the same manner as other parts of the car. Generally they are enameled instead of painted. A motorist who takes unusual pride in the appearance of his car advises that the fenders after being washed clean, can be polished so that one may see the reflection of his face by first smearing the enamel with Bon Ami or some similar substance and when dry wiping it off with a soft cloth. All spots are said to be removed and a clean, bright surface produced.

Questions Answered

WHEN SPARK SHOULD BE RETARDED.—Please tell me what should be done to the spark when an automobile engine is in a hard pull. Also should not the spark be retarded when starting? T. R. N., Raisin, Cal.

A.—It is the intention of the automobile manufacturer to time the ignition current so that the spark will take place when the piston in the cylinder reaches top center. Due to the time necessary to convert a primary current into secondary the spark must be advanced to compensate for the high speed of a motor. In other words the faster the engine is run the higher should be advanced the spark lever. When starting the motor however, regardless of whether the hand crank or electric starter be used the spark lever should be fully retarded. If the hand crank is used and the spark lever is advanced a back fire is apt to take place. Such an occurrence may result in broken limbs. If the electric starter is used and the spark lever advanced a heavy drain is placed on the storage battery and the starter commutator is apt to become burnt. When the engine is given a hard pull the spark lever should be advanced as far as possible without causing the motor to knock. As before stated the position of the lever depends upon the speed of the engine. At times it may be possible to run with the spark fully advanced while at other times it may be necessary to fully retard the spark. The speed of the engine is the only point to be considered in the handling of the spark lever. It follows, therefore, that in proportion as the hard pull lowers the engine speed the spark should be retarded to avoid knocking.

Comfort's League of Cousins

my life I sip a cup of hot water. After that I take a tablespoonful of mineral oil and the juice of an orange. Mineral oil is tasteless and odorless, and is a perfect lubricant. People realize no matter how ignorant they are that an engine won't run without oil. The body also runs all the better for a little lubricating. Nothing stimulates the stomach more than a well-cleaned intestinal tract. Mineral oil is not absorbed. There is no nourishment in it. It is, as I said before, just a lubricant. All the big drug-houses put up this mineral oil which is simply refined paraffin oil. It is no good putting drugs into the stomach or expecting the stomach to act if the intestines are clogged and most intestines are clogged. Olive oil is a lubricant and a food, but the stomach absorbs so much of it that very little gets into the intestinal tract, and then again it nauseates many people. I also have on my tray at every meal five drops of nux vomica, the greatest stomachic we have, a regular old medical stand by, and there is nothing to beat it. It tones up the stomach, gives one an appetite, helps to disperse gas, and is a splendid heart and nerve tonic. Nux vomica is strychnine, a deadly poison if taken in large or even small quantities, ten drops is the limit. It can be taken before eating, or sipped while eating. After eating take five or ten grains of lactopeptin or five or six drops of takadiastase in a little water. The latter drug is a starch digesting ferment, and has been used for a number of years by the best stomach specialists. It is cheap and can be got in any drug-store. If you are troubled with gas, lie down on your right side for a little while then turn over on your left side. Repeat this stunt two or three times and then sit up and you will find the gas will immediately disperse. Turning from side to side acts as a stomach massage and churns up the food aids digestion and quickly expels gas. One should always keep in the house some tablets of soda, mint and pepsin. These tablets can be got for a few cents in any drug-store and it has to be a pretty tough case of indigestion that they won't handle successfully. Gas is caused by food fermentation. The stomach is too weak or too diseased, or the digestive juices are not secreted in sufficient quantities to act on the contents of the stomach properly so there the food lies like a lump of lead and ferments. Usually because it is the wrong kind of food or it has not been properly chewed. Now if the stomach has been toned up with hot water and nux vomica, and a digestive has been taken after eating, the odds are everything will run along smoothly and comfortably. If however there is still trouble, there is a tablet on the market which contains paw paw, soda and charcoal. This is broken up and dissolved in a little hot water and is often magic in its results. Now let me tell you something that few know about the stomach though all ought to know. The stomach is a born wanderer and as Dr. Woods Hutchinson says: "It loves to go avisiting." If you find it under your arm and walking around in your shoe don't be alarmed for it is quite some pedestrian. When the stomach does go on a visit to another part of the body it is utterly useless swallowing pepsin tablets. Sometimes the stomach drops away down out of its place, then it is impossible for it to empty the digested food up to and out of the pyloric end of the stomach. There is a little valve which at intervals opens and allows the food to pass from the pyloric end on the right side of the stomach into the duodenum which is the upper end and beginning of the small intestines of which you have no less than twenty-five feet, and from there into the big intestine and so out of the body. I read recently of a man who had stomach trouble and who went from specialist to specialist for months, getting no relief, until one physician who had something the others had not, sense and imagination, put him under the X ray and found that his tummie had dropped down out of place and was trying to hold an animated conversation with his big toe. Then the patient was put on his back, pillows placed under his loins, and a peregrinating, peripatetic, wanderlust stomach shuffled back into its place and the machinery of digestion went on normally and after a few weeks the man was well. People who have stomach trouble should first of all study the geography of the body and find out if the stomach is in its proper place or gone avisiting, for if it has gone avisiting, all the treatment and all the pepsin tablets in the world will be found useless. It would take a whole issue of COMFORT to discuss the diseases of the stomach. Acute indigestion is generally due to a catarrhal inflammation of the lining membrane of the stomach. Sometimes there is also acute catarrh of the first part of the intestines. This condition is caused by food which the stomach has been unable to digest and which has begun to decompose. This condition may be caused by fatigue, overeating, alcohol or an upset nervous system. Stomach specialists in chronic cases usually pump out the stomach after a test meal has been taken, make a chemical examination of the contents to discover the exact cause of the disorder. If a physician does not do this, his diagnosis is mere guesswork. Unless the organs are supplied with good blood the digestive juices will not be secreted properly. People who are anæmic, whose blood is of poor quality, should, if they can digest them, eat raisins which are full of iron, and should keep in the open air as much as possible and improve the condition of the blood, if they want to get rid of dyspepsia. The movements of the stomach and intestines and the secretions of the digestive juices are under the control of the nervous system. If your nerves are out of order, nervous dyspepsia generally results. The things that cause indigestion as a rule are frying pan abominations, fried articles of food, hot bread, pies, pancakes, ice water, soda water, too much candy and bad teeth. When there is vomiting and pain, especially vomiting of blood an ulcer of the stomach is usually indicated. An ulcerated stomach requires very careful treatment, as an ulcer may perforate the stomach wall and spill the contents of the stomach internally with disastrous results. Vomiting especially of dark coffee colored material, loss of weight and pallor and pain, especially in a person over forty, usually indicates cancer of the stomach. When bright blood is coughed up it comes from the lungs, when dark blood is vomited it comes from the stomach. Now please preserve this article all of you, and it will save you asking numberless questions in the future, questions I am physically incapable of answering. No stomach ailment, remember, will yield to treatment unless one diets strictly. Directly the stomach shows signs of distress, give it a rest for a day and then go on milk diet until real genuine hunger sets in, then take to a semi-solid diet and finally to full diet. Cut out tea and coffee. They are poison.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE AND COUSINS:

I want to express my appreciation of your splendid editorials and replies to the cousins' letters. They are not only interesting but also possess a high educational value. The forcible style and language they are written in, is well calculated to set the wheels of thought in motion in the most hardened human fossil that ever lived. They have been and are still a source of inspiration and encouragement to me. I have your book of poems—a better cure for the blues I have never found. I am passionately fond of books and nearly all of my spare time is spent in their company. I am a farmer thirty years of age and single. I have a farm of forty acres. They are devoted to the growth of small fruits and vegetables. Afton (where I live) is becoming favorably known throughout the state for its excellent strawberries and raspberries. We sell our fruit through a cooperative association which we organized about two years ago and have found it a better method than the old one. Formerly each grower was obliged to haul his own berries to market or sell at home to buyers from the cities, but at a loss to the grower.

St. Paul is the capital of our state and has a population of over 200,000 people. I live within twelve miles of our new state prison. It is one of the best and most modern prisons in the United States if not in the world. At present writing the total num-and I do not believe this is any place for you. You are too fair and sweet to serve a woman with such a disposition as madam possesses, and I wish you would leave her when we go back to the city. I know you are poor, and have no friends upon whom you can depend; but I would settle a comfortable annuity upon you, so that you could be independent and make a pretty little home for your——"

The Masked Bridal

"How dare you talk to me like this? Do you think I have no pride—no self-respect?" Edith demanded.

Her act and the flash of the diamond attracted his attention to the little chain and shamrock upon her breast.

The sight seemed to paralyze him for a moment, for he stood like one turned to marble.

"Where did you get it?" he at last demanded, in a scarcely audible voice, as he pointed a trembling finger at the jewel. "Tell me!—tell me! how came you by it?"

Edith regarded him with astonishment.

Involuntarily she put up her hand and covered the ornament from his gaze.

"It was given to me," she briefly replied.

"Who gave it to you?"

"A friend."

"Was it your—a relative?" cried the man.

"No, it was simply a friend."

"Tell me who!"

"All that I can tell you, Mr. Goddard," she gravely said, after a pause, "is that the chain and ornament were given to me very recently by an aged friend——"

"Aged!" the man interposed, eagerly.

"Yes, by a person who must be at least sixty years of age," the young girl replied.

"Ah!" The ejaculation was one of supreme relief. "Excuse me, Miss Allen!" he continued, in a more natural manner than he had yet spoken. "I did not mean to be curious, but—a—a person whom I once knew had an ornament very similar to the one you wear——"

He was interrupted just at this point by the sound of a rich, mellow laugh that echoed down the hall like a strain of sweetest music; whereupon Gerald Goddard jumped as if some one had dealt him a heavy blow on the back.

"Good Heaven! who was that?" he cried, with livid lips.

But Edith, taking advantage of the diversion, glided swiftly from the room.

The man stood motionless for a moment after her departure, as if waiting for the sound, which had so startled him, to be repeated.

But it was not, and going to the door, he peered into the hall to see who was there.

There was no one visible save the housekeeper, who just at that moment, accosted a housemaid, to whom she appeared to be giving some directions.

"Ah! it was only one of the guests," he muttered, "but the voice was wonderfully like—like —— Ugh!"

He waited a few moments longer, trying to compose his nerves, which had been sadly unstrung, both by the wine he had drank in much larger quantities than usual, and the incidents that had just occurred, and then sought his own room, where he rang for a brandy-and-soda, and after taking it, went below to attend to his duties as host.

But neither he nor Edith dreamed that their recent interview had been observed by a third party, or had seen the white convulsed face that had been looking in upon them, between the blinds at one of the windows, near which they had been standing.

Anna Goddard had sought her own room, directly after dinner, to make some little change in her toilet, and get her gloves, which she had left lying upon her dressing case.

As she opened the door of her boudoir she came very near giving utterance to a scream of fear upon coming face to face with a man.

The man was Emil Correlli, who had gained entrance to the apartment by climbing the vine trellis which led to the window. His secret return was in accordance with a plan previously agreed upon.

He informed his sister that he had sent a card of invitation to Mrs. Stewart of the Copley Square Hotel.

"I am glad you did," she responded; "I have long desired to meet her."

They then proceeded to discuss the important event of the evening and Mrs. Goddard assured him that their plot was progressing admirably. Still she manifested a tinge of remorse as she thought of the despicable trick she had devised against the fair girl whom her brother was so eager to possess.

"Anna you must not fail me now!" he exclaimed, "or I will never forgive you! The girl must be mine or——"

"Hush!" she interposed. "Did some one knock," "I heard nothing."

"It was only a false alarm," she murmured, glancing down the hall; then she started, as if stung, as she caught sight of two figures in the room diagonally opposite hers.

Her face grew ghastly, but her eyes blazed with a tiger-like ferocity.

She closed the door noiselessly, then with stealthy, cat-like movements, she stole toward the French door, leading out upon the veranda, throwing a long mantle over her light dress and bare shoulders. Then she passed out, and crept along the veranda toward a window of the room where her husband and Edith were talking.

She could see them distinctly through the slats of the blinds, which were movable—could see the man bending toward the graceful girl, whom she had never seen so beautiful as now, his face eager, a wistful light burning in his eyes, while his lips moved rapidly with the tale that he was pouring into her ears.

She could not hear a word, but her jealous heart imputed the very worst to him.

She could see that Edith repudiated him—that she was indignant and dismayed; but this circumstance did not soothe her in the least.

It was enough to arouse all the worst elements of her fiery nature to know that the girl's charms were alluring the man whom she worshiped and a very demon of jealousy and hatred possessed her.

She watched them until she saw her husband give that guilty start, of which Edith took advantage to escape, and then, her hands clenched until the nails almost pierced the tender flesh, her lips convulsed—her whole face distorted with passion and pain, she turned from the spot.

"I have no longer any conscience," she hissed, as she sped swiftly back to her room. "The girl is doomed—she has sealed her own fate. As for him—if I did not love him so, I would——"

A shudder completed her sentence, but smoothing her face, she removed her wraps, and went to tell her brother that she must go below, but would have his dinner sent up immediately.

Then drawing on her gloves, she hastened down to join her guests in the drawing-room.

CHAPTER XI.

"NOW MY VINDICATION AND TRIUMPH WILL BE COMPLETE!"

When Anna Goddard descended to her spacious and elegant parlors, her face was wreathed with the brightest smiles, which, alas! covered and concealed the bitterness and anger of her corrupt heart, even while she circulated among her friends with apparently the greatest pleasure, and with her usual charm and manner.

After a short time spent socially, the guests repaired to the spacious carriage-house, where the theatrical performance was to take place, to secure the most desirable seats for the play, before the multitude from outside should arrive.

The place had been very handsomely decorated, and lighted by electricity for the occasion. Potted flowers, palms and ferns were artistically grouped in the corners, and handsome draperies were hung here and there to simulate windows and doors, and to conceal whatever might otherwise have been unsightly.

The floor had been covered with something smooth, linoleum or oil-cloth, and then thoroughly waxed, for after the play was over, the place was to be cleared for dancing.

Across one end, a commodious stage had been erected, although this was at present concealed by a beautiful drop-curtain of crimson felt, bordered with old gold.

The room filled rapidly, and long before the time for the curtain to ascend, every seat was occupied.

At eight o'clock, precisely, the signal was given, and the play began.

Programs had been distributed among the audience—dainty little cards of embossed white and gold they were, too—announcing the title, "The Masked Bridal," giving the names of the participants, and promising that the affair would close with a genuine surprise to everyone.

The piece opened in an elegantly appointed library, with a spirited scene and dialogue between a young couple, who were desirous of marrying, and the four objecting parents.

In the next scene the unfortunate young couple are represented as plotting with two other lovers, whose wedding-day is set, to circumvent their obdurate parents, and carry out their determination to become husband and wife.

This offer was full of energy and interest, and the curtain went down amid enthusiastic applause.

Edith, who had assisted madam in the dressing-room as long as she was needed, had come outside, at the beginning of the scene, and stationed herself at the back of the room to watch the progress of the play.

But she had been there only for a few moments when someone touched her on the shoulder to attract her attention.

Glancing around, she saw a young girl, one of the guests in the house, who remarked:

"Mrs. Goddard wished me to tell you to come to her at once in her boudoir. Please be quick, as the matter is important."

Edith immediately glided from the room, but wondering what could have happened that madam should want her in her own apartments, when she supposed her to be behind the scenes.

Meantime, while the guests were being entertained with the play of which their hostess was the acknowledged author, a mysterious scene was being enacted within the mansion.

When the hour for the entertainment drew near, the house, as we know, had been emptied of its guests, until only the housekeeper, the butler, and the other servants remained.

The butler had been instructed to keep ward and watch below, while Mrs. Weld went upstairs, ostensibly to ascertain that everything was as it should be there, but in reality, to carry out a project of her own.

Seeking the maids, who, since they had no duties at that particular moment to occupy them, had gathered in the dressing-rooms, and were discussing the merits of the various costumes which they had seen, she remarked, in her kindly, good-natured way:

"Girls, I am sure you would like a peep at the play, and Mrs. Goddard gave me permission to send you out, if you could be spared. I will look after ever thing up here, and you may go now, only be sure to hurry back the moment it is over, for you will then be needed again."

They were of course delighted with this privilege, but Mollie who was an unusually considerate girl, and always willing to oblige others, inquired:

"Wouldn't you like to see the play, Mrs. Weld? I will stay and let you go."

"No, thank you, child. I had enough of such things years ago," the housekeeper returned. "Run along, all of you, so as to be there when the curtain goes up."

And the girls, only too eager for the sport, needing no second bidding, sped away.

Thus the upper portion of the mansion was entirely deserted, but for the housekeeper and the unsuspected presence of Emil Correlli, who was locked within his own room, awaiting from his sister the signal for his appearance upon the stage below.

The moment the housemaids were beyond hearing, Mrs. Weld gave utterance to a long sigh of relief, whipped off her blue spectacles, and with a swift, noiseless step, wholly unlike her usual waddling gait, hurried down the hall, and into Mrs. Goddard's room, carefully closing and locking the door after her.

Proceeding to the dressing-room, a quick, searching glance showed her the object she was looking for—my lady's jewel-casket, standing wide open upon a small, marble-top table near a full-length mirror.

It had been rifled of most of its contents, madam herself having worn many of her jewels, while others had been loaned to the actors to embellish their costumes for the play.

"Ah! my task is made much easier than I expected," murmured the woman.

She saw only an empty tray, which she carefully removed, only to find another exactly like it underneath.

This also she took out, revealing the bottom of the box, covered with its velvet cushion, upon which there were indentations, to receive a full set of jewelry, necklace, bracelets, tiara, brooch and ear-rings.

The housekeeper's face was ghastly pale, or would have been but for the stain which gave her complexion its olive tinge, and she was trembling with excitement.

"She surely took that paper from this box," she muttered, a note of disappointment in her voice, as if she had expected to find what she sought upon removing the second tray.

"I wonder if this cushion can be removed?" she continued, as she tried to lift it from its place.

But it fited so closely she could not stir it.

Looking around the room for something to assist her in this effort, she espied a pair of scissors on the dressing-case.

Seizing them she attempted to pry up the cushion with them.

It was not an easy thing to do, without defacing the velvet, but, at length, she succeeded in lifting one side, when she found no difficulty in removing the whole thing.

Her agitation increased as her glance fell upon several papers snugly packed in the bottom of the box.

"Ah! if it should prove to be something of no account to me!" she breathed, with trembling lips.

At last she straightened herself with sudden resolution, and putting her hand into the box drew forth the uppermost paper.

It was yellow with time, and so brittle that it cracked apart in one of the creases as she opened it; but paying no heed to this, she stepped to the dressing-case, and spread it out before her, while her eager eyes swept the mystic page from top to bottom.

Then a cry that ended in a great sob burst from her hueless lips.

"It is! it is!" she gasped, in voiceless agitation. "Ah, Heaven, thou art gracious to me at last! Now, I know why she would not surrender it to him—now I know what the condition of its ransom must have been!

"How long has she had it, I wonder? and when did she first learn of its existence?" she murmured. "Ah! but it does not matter—I have it at last—I, who dared not hope for its existence, believing it must have been destroyed, until the other day; and now"—throwing back her head with an air that was very expressive—"my vindication and triumph will be complete!"

With the greatest care, she refolded the paper, after which she impulsively pressed it to her lips; then, putting it away in her pocket, she turned back to the jewel-casket, and peered curiously into it once more.

"I wonder what other intrigues she has been guilty of?" she muttered, regarding its contents with a frown.

She laid her hand upon one of the papers, as if to remove it, then drew back.

"No," she said, "I will touch nothing else; I have what I came to seek, and have no right to meddle with what does not concern me. Let her keep her other vile secrets to herself; my victory is already complete."

She replaced the velvet cushion, pressing it hard down into its place.

She then restored the trays as she had found them, but did not close the casket, since she had found it open.

She retraced her steps into the boudoir, where, as she was passing out, she trod upon something that attracted her attention.

She stooped to ascertain what it was, and discovered a gentleman's glove.

"Ah," she said, as she picked it up and examined it. "I should say it belongs to madam's brother! In that case, he must have returned this evening to attend the grand finale, although I am sure he was not at the dinner-table."

She dropped the glove upon the floor where she had found it, but there was a look of perplexity upon her face as she did so.

"It seems a little strange," she mused, "that the young man should have been away all this time; and if he was to return at all, I cannot understand why there should have been t' is air of secrecy about it. He has evidently been in this room tonight, but I am sure he has not been seen about the house."

She opened the door and passed out into the hall, when she was startled to hear the voice of Mrs. Goddard talking, in the hall below, with the butler.

Mrs. Weld quietly slipped across to the room opposite—the same one in which Edith and Mr. Goddard had held their interview earlier in the evening—where, seating herself under a light, she caught up a book from the table, and pretended to be deeply absorbed in its contents.

A moment later, madam, having ascended the stairs, came hurrying down the hall, and saw her there.

She started.

It would never do for the woman to suspect the truth regarding what she was about to do.

No one must dream that Edith was not lending herself willingly to the last scene in the drama of the evening and she expected to have some difficulty in persuading her to take the part.

There must be no possibility of anyone hearing any objections that she might make, for, in that case, the charge of fraud could be brought and proved against her and her brother, after all was over.

But after the first flash of dismay, the cunning woman devised a scheme which would take the housekeeper out of her way and leave the field clear for her operations.

Your Grandfather Knew These Rubber Footwear Trade Marks

WHEN he bought a new pair of rubber boots, the thing he was most particular about was to see that one of these trade-marks was plainly stamped on each boot.

Their names are names to conjure with; each one of them represents a modest beginning, a remarkable growth, a continuous record of quality production, coupled with honorable tradition.

The thought of making any article in any way or from any materials that were not the very best for the purpose would never have occurred to any of these great manufacturers.

To-day, these same trade-marks are on good rubber footwear for your guidance in buying. Only an expert can distinguish good from poor rubber footwear by external appearance and touch. Thus it becomes a matter of self-interest and self-protection for you to make certain that any rubber footwear you buy is marked with one of these famous brands.

Seventy-four years of successful manufacturing and the experience of forty-seven great factories are back of every pair of rubber shoes, overshoes, arctics, boots, etc., produced by the United States Rubber Company, the largest rubber manufacturer in the world.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

send a stamped envelope, I will gladly tell as much as I can about N. Dak., but COMFORT's Sisters' Corner is too precious to tell all that many wished to know.

We are still on the ranch, still trying to be cheerful in these days of hard living, for our crops were failures this year—and it is just another load the bank bears in granting loans to many who have to mortgage stock and sometimes, the ranch also, to get money to tide them over until next year—but

"Better to hope tho' the clouds hang low,
And to keep the eyes still lifted;
For the bright blue sky will soon peep through,
When the ominous clouds are rifted."

For the benefit of those who asked, but gave no address, let me say that we have no children, no home-friends, and no relatives here, that we were forced to come to this place through circumstances over which we had no control.

"I would have chosen my life to be Active, tireless and strong;
A constant, ceaseless working for Him,
Amid the needy throng.
But He chose for me a better lot—
A life of frequent pain
Of strength withheld when 'twas needed most,
And loss instead of gain."

For God doeth all things well.

I must leave you now, but remember this, that although I am so far, far away from all of you, I think of you every day and pray for God to bless you you every night.

If not too busy in each of your several homes, I shall be doubly grateful for a loving thought and prayer. May God's rich blessing be to COMFORT, its staff, Uncle Charlie, especially, and to all the loving readers, Lingeringly, lovingly, farewell, if we never meet again, MRS. E. H. PRATHER.

Home Is Where the Heart Is

Home's not merely four square walls,
Though with pictures hung and gilded,
Home is where affection calls,
Filled with shrines the heart hath builded!

Home!—go watch the faithful dove,
Sailing 'neath the Heaven above us;
Home is where there's one to love,
Home is where there's one to love us!

Home's not merely roof and room—
It needs something to endear it;
Home is where the heart can bloom—
Where there's some kind lip to cheer it!

What is home with none to meet—
None to welcome, none to greet us?
Home is sweet—and only sweet—
Where there's one we love to meet us.

—Charles Swain.

Trifles

What will it matter in a little while
That for a day
We met and gave a word, a touch, a smile
Upon the way?

What will it matter whether hearts were brave
And lives were true;
That you gave me the sympathy I crave
As I gave you?

These trifles! Can it be they make or mar
A human life?
Are souls as lightly waved as rushes are
By love or strife?

Yea, yea! a look the fainting heart may break
Or make it whole:
And just one word, if said for love's sweet sake,
May save a soul.

—May Riley Smith.

The Arrow and the Song

I shot an arrow into the air,
It fell to earth, I know not where;
For, so swiftly it flew, the sight
Could not follow it in its flight.

I breathed a song into the air,
It fell to earth, I know not where:
For who has sight so keen and strong
That it can follow the flight of song?

Long, long afterward, in an oak
I found the arrow, still unbroke:
And the song, from beginning to end,
I found again in the heart of a friend.

—Henry W. Longfellow.

When the middle of the sheets wear out, make pillow cases of the sides. Pillow cases made this way will wear a long time.

MARGARET JOHNS, Sarasota, Fla.

Try cooking dried apples mixed with dried apricots, about two parts apple to one part apricots. This is much better than either fruit cooked alone. This is good to make sandwiches of when traveling, as it keeps well. We usually take some in a glass jar.

Pick your apples in the last quarter of the moon and the little bruises will dry down instead of rotting. Also when setting out a young orchard, set the trees in the first quarter of the moon and they will bear much earlier. This is not guesswork for it has been tested. I plant my garden "in the moon," it has never failed to get good results, if the season is any ways a good one.

MRS. BENJ. CLANIN, Siloam Springs, Ark.

Remedies

BURNS.—For carbolic acid burns or burns with lye, apply vinegar freely.

MRS. MAUDE HURST, Barling, Ark.

Honey mixed with a little black pepper is said to cure any cough, except consumption.

Honey is splendid used as a poultice on boils, cuts or raw sores. It is also good to give a person an appetite when they are "all run down" even if they can't eat much of it at first.

MRS. BENJ. CLANIN, Siloam Springs, Ark.

INFLAMMATION OF THE BLADDER.—Steep a tablespoon of whole flaxseed in a quart of boiling water until it is quite thick. Add the juice of half a lemon, and sugar to taste. Drink freely in place of other liquid. This is an old remedy given us many years ago by an old physician and is all we ever use for this trouble. M. V. H., California.

Requests

Mrs. Ethel K. Jones, Clayton, Gresham Route, N. Mex., would like song, "The Little Match Girl."

Mrs. A. Tsigaridis, Sheldon, R. R. 1, Box 56, N. Dak., would like words and music of song, "When I Lost You."

Georgia Lee Boyle, Hoods, Ky., would like songs, "I'll not be with you long dear mother," and "In that white city."

Will some sister send me about three hundred china berries. I will return the favor in any way I can. MRS. M. O. MONSON, Upland, R. R. 1, Nebr.

Can any reader send me the August and September COMFORT of the year 1915. I will return favor in any possible way.

MRS. JESSIE ROSENCRANTZ, Weldman, Mich.

Mrs. J. D. Sutphin, Cincinnati, 1508 Blue Rock St., Ohio, would like to hear from sisters living in Colorado who know of a small farm that can be homesteaded or bought. One near works of some kind.

Do any of the sisters know where I could get an old time song book called "The Sacred Melodion." It used the buckwheat or square notes. We used this book long ago when we went to singing school in Wisconsin. Would like so well to get one of the books.

MRS. BENJ. CLANIN, Siloam Springs, Ark.

Will some kind sister send me the poem entitled "Mabel." The opening lines are,

In a pleasant little village
Mabel lived, a simple child,
Her long curls were golden yellow
And her eyes were blue and mild.

The Way of a Woman

PART II.

COULD it be the dainty, lissome stenographer she had smiled at in Norman's private office?

She dismissed that thought as soon as it was conceived. Norman was not the man to carry his shame into his business.

Suddenly a piercing thought drove itself into her brain there to become conviction.

Edith Thornton! Norman admired her extravagantly. Might not the feeling have become warmer? Her ideas were advanced and her instincts lenient toward guilt.

Or weren't they? Was she being uncharitable in her misery? At any rate, one knew almost nothing of her life before she had come to the city a few years earlier. She tried to shut out the throbbing thoughts.

Every minute was bringing her nearer to Norman—the bitter celebration of her natal day.

"We are almost there?"

Stanley nodded, his morose eyes on the stretch of smooth road.

"Stop!" she said imperatively. "I want to go down there a minute."

She pointed to a lovely cluster of trees by a little stream.

Already past it, Stanley reversed and drew out of the road.

"Lesbia, don't cut up rough with Norman," he said sharply as she opened the door of the car.

"You aren't blameless, you know. I've been thinking it over on the way up. At first I wanted to take his throat in my naked hands and tear the breath out of it, but I begin to see his point of view."

Lesbia, arrested, looked at her brother, stunned. Was the boy mad?

"Men want comrades in their wives, but you girls won't be that after you're married. You go off on lines of your own and your husbands can jolly well paddle their own pleasure craft. I can remember when you were crazy to get off alone with Norman. I tell you, women tire of propinquity a lot quicker than men do."

"But you seem to forget that we have——"

"Don't say you have children! You all presume on that. Children make convenient whips to lash your husbands' desires into the shape of your own. It's great to be a mother, but I'd rather a wife of mine qualified as a wife first. I've heard Norman beg you to go off on trips with him and you've refused. His wishes never seem to count with you now."

"But——"

"You seem to think just because you're married you can settle back and pick out the kind of life that suits your own selfish desire."

"You're brutal!" gasped Lesbia.

"I don't wonder men cut loose. You keep the letter of the decalogue but you take a pick-axe to its spirit and then you go up in the air when you can't get by with it. Go down to that bunch of trees if you want to, but take along what I've said."

Lesbia went, stumbling blindly. She was insensible to the trilling vespers of the mated birds, the fragrant country sweetness of the air, and the soft violet tints on land and river.

Without wishing it, she was analyzing herself. It was as if she had lost physical control of her mental processes. With her back against a tree, she groped for conclusions and grasped them.

When she went back to the car, Stanley shot her one quick, inquiring glance before throwing in the clutch, but he asked no question. He had no need. Her white face was serene. She had fought her beasts and triumphed.

A few minutes later they were at the hospital.

"I'll go to the hotel. It's better for me not to come till you send for me."

Lesbia nodded, grateful for Stanley's perception.

"Mr. Vaughan is conscious now. His injuries, while painful, are not serious," an interne said to Lesbia.

"Mrs. Vaughan is only nervously unstrung."

"There has been a mistake. I am Mrs. Vaughan," Lesbia explained quietly.

"I see. Mistakes frequently occur."

She was glad that a hospital staff is impervious to curiosity.

The young doctor left her at Norman's door. She paused to marshal her courage before stepping into the room.

He lay quite quiet, looking as helpless as a child in his bandages.

His eyes brightened at the sight of Lesbia.

The nurse left the room as Lesbia went over to the bed and knelt to touch him.

"Dearest girl, can you forgive me?" he asked in wistful eagerness.

She caressed the hand that lay on the white coverlet.

"They tell me she isn't badly injured. Is it true? Tell me. Have you seen her?"

His solicitude very nearly broke Lesbia's control.

"Do you want me to go to her now?"

"Oh, please. And come at once to tell me she is all right."

How she ever got to the other woman's door she never knew. But she found herself there, blinded, and deafened by the pounding in her ears.

She pulled herself together at a little cry from the high bed. She compelled herself to go over to where the woman lay, inert and very lovely, even in the plain white hospital robe.

Her eyes clearing at last, Lesbia gave a sobbing gasp as she gathered her into her strong arms.

"It's you! To think that it's you! Oh, Sylvia, darling, I'm so glad it's you!"

"So I gather," Sylvia said dryly. "If your gladness is in proportion to my injuries, I suppose you would have been transported if I'd been killed. I'll get smashed up again some day just to please you."

"You don't understand, dear," Lesbia was laughing as she wept. "The papers—I thought ——"

Sylvia looked at her shrewdly. "I believe I do understand," she guessed. "They have been calling me Mrs. Vaughan. Did it reach the papers that way?"

Lesbia nodded.

"And you thought—oh, Lesbia!"

"I know," Lesbia said, abased.

"And he did it because you were so disappointed that I couldn't get there for the dinner. He met me at the Lodge directly after the wedding. We were trying to get home for tea."

Lesbia got up from her knees. "I must go call Stanley. He thinks—the other thing."

But there was no need to telephone Stanley. On the broad stair she met him, leaping up noiselessly.

"It's all right, sis," he cried, his arm about her waist.

"That darn-fool clerk recognized Norman and thought he did you and registered that way. That's what comes of being as-alike-as-two-peas twins;

"Go to Sylvia, in there. I want Norman alone."

"I say, Lesbia, I talked like a sponge back there."

She went to Norman, smiling into his pathetically anxious eyes.

"Sylvia's as right as rain," she said. "You can both go home with Stanley and me in the big car tomorrow."

"Oh, Lesbia! What a mess of a birthday it has been!"

"Why, Norman, it has been a heavenly one! To know that you were hurt and to find you like this!"

"Lesbia," after a time, "I'm almost afraid of you. There's something new in your face—something blinding, like a too-bright sun."

There are times when, with bowed head and reverent knee, we enter the very presence of the Godhead. That Lesbia had passed through such a moment and that the radiance still lingered, Norman could not know.

"As soon as you're able, dear, let's go on a long trip together—just the two of us—a-gypsying," she said.

"Will you?"

He reached for the bell with his uninjured hand.

"Nurse," he said, when she had come, "when can I get my hands on a wheel again?"

The nurse smiled at Lesbia. "In a couple of weeks, I should think," she replied.

He turned to his wife. "In two weeks, dear," he said.

Poultry Farming for Women

acute indigestion, which frequently results in death. We don't grow it in this part of the country, so I can't speak from personal experience. As your birds seem to be affected only at a certain time of the year, I advise you to confine them to yards next year, when the danger period arrives.

P. E. C.—It is difficult to say which breed of fowl is really the best, care and feeding have so much to do with it. As you live in a part of the country where the winters are severe, I think you would find the White Wyandottes and Rhode Island Reds more profitable than Leghorns or any other lighter breeds. You ask which is the most profitable, raising chickens, or eggs for market. It depends very much on how far you are away from a good local market, and how much time you intend to devote to poultry. Eggs are easier to ship any distance than chickens, and there is usually a steadier local demand for eggs than for chickens.

E. H. H.—The chickens had what is known as air puff (emphysema), which originates through some injury to the lungs. A mother hen stepping on the chickens, or chickens crowding into a corner when a hen first leaves them; young cockerels fighting, and such unavoidable accidents are all apt to be the seat of trouble. The injury to the lungs allows the air to get into the blood and inflate the tissues. Nature will effect a cure as the injury heals, but relief can be given by piercing the puffy surface with a clean needle and gently pressing out the air. The last bird of which you speak must have had very rough treatment, which also hurt her legs. As she is becoming a pet, and you are giving her special attention, she is pretty sure to recover and be none the worse for it.

M. F. W.—It is against our rules to publish addresses in this column. Look through our advertising columns and you will find the information you desire.

H. W.—We don't publish any book on poultry, and it would be quite impossible to tell you all about poultry raising in this column. Read the poultry department each month and you will find general instructions for all the different branches of the work. Ask me any specific questions and I shall be pleased to help you.

L. G.—Should say the trouble in the throat is something local. Possibly the bird has swallowed something. It may be a small tumor, the result of some injury in the past. There is no danger of inflammation in such a case, but as the bird will eventually suffer through inability to eat, it will be kinder to kill her at once.

B. P.—Want of space in the October and November numbers prevented my giving a description of the non-freezing water fountain which I referred to in September. It is quite simple to make. Thoroughly cleanse two wooden butter or lard tubs, which can be got from any grocer store, cut a circular hole about half way up on one side of the tub, just large enough to push a pound baking powder tin through, then saw off three inches all round the top of the second tub. Put three inches of sawdust in the bottom of the first tub, stand the second tub on it, mark where the hole in the first tub comes on the second tub, and cut out to correspond. Then take the bottom out of the baking powder can, and make eight cuts at equal distances around each edge; they should be about half an inch deep. Push the tin through the holes in both tubs, turn the cut edges back on the outside of the first tub and the inside of the second tub. Hammer down flat, and use a few small brads to hold them in place. Now fill in sawdust all round between the two tubs, packing very tight right up to the top edge. The tin can prevents the sawdust escaping through the holes or getting into the inside tub. Next, get a granite or tin pail with a top handle, that will fit comfortably into the inside tub, and deep enough to bring the top of it even with the bottom of the hole. The pail is, of course, to hold the water, and is easily taken out or in for cleaning. Use the top of the outer tub as a cover, to keep out dirt and cold air. Fowls never make any fuss about putting their heads through the small tunnel to drink, and the padding makes it a perfect frost resisting receptacle for water or milk.

A. L. K.—I fear the pullet has tuberculosis, as you say there were white spots on the spleen and liver. The peculiarity of bird tuberculosis is the fact that the droppings of the affected bird may spread the disease, so, as doctoring is seldom successful, the safest course is to kill any suspicious cases. The first noticeable symptoms are loss of weight, wasting of the muscles, paleness of the comb, and later, dullness, sleepiness and diarrhea, and sometimes inflammation or swelling of the joints of the shanks. In some cases, birds will gradually become lame. After getting rid of all suspicious birds, thoroughly cleanse and disinfect house and runs, and all feed and water dishes. This is a bad time of year to stop feeding grain; better go back to your old method of feeding.

S. J. B.—To raise geese successfully you must have breeders that are more than two years old. The geese from young stock seldom hatch well; and even what goslings you do get are usually wanting in vitality, and seldom mature. Geese are grazing creatures, and need the run of pasture, and should have a little grain mash for supper, and dry sleeping quarters. Goats are profitable, and splendid for clearing brush land, as they will devour all sprouts, and soon kill off all growth. They need the same care as sheep, and positively must have clean, dry sleeping quarters.

C. G.—Sometimes chickens from the very best stock will be found with a black feather. The Standard calls for yellow beak, shanks and feet, bright bay eyes; face and wattles, earlobes and comb, all bright red. Plumage, white throughout. Weight: cocks, eight and one half pounds, cockerels, seven and one half, hens, six and one half, pullets, five and one half Yes; sometimes the baby chicks which develop into the best and whitest birds are quite smudgy when first hatched. Your suggestion about breeding the cockerels and pullets from the same hatch is all right; also breeding back to sires next season.

J. C. H.—You will find the Wyandottes the most profitable egg producers as your winters are severe. Please look through the advertising columns. Yes; the method of grading up stock is the same for all kinds of poultry. Some people think one mating is sufficient for the whole season with turkeys, but we always remate after a hen has been broody.

W. R. T.—Mix equal parts of ground oats and corn, chopped Alfalfa or clover hay and half a portion of cotton seed meal; moisten one quart of the mixture with enough scalded milk to make it a crumbly mash; or, if you haven't milk, add one half portion of beef scraps and use boiling water. Scatter oats in the litter at 8:30; about a quart for the ten hens. Feed mash at 11:30, and any vegetables that you may have; cabbage, beets or sprouted oats. At 3:30 feed one quart of whole corn mixed with half a pint of oats and half a pint of cracked corn. Keep oyster shell, sharp grit and clean water before them all the time. The litter on the floor of the poultry-house should be clean and dry, and at least six inches deep, so that they will have to scratch for the grain when it is scattered. The exercise is necessary for health and egg production.

G. M. S.—The birds are suffering from roup, which, as you possibly know, is a contagious disease, and unless very rigid precautions are taken, is apt to spread through an entire flock. Clean, disinfect and whitewash the house and all the inside fixtures. Separate sickly looking birds from the rest of the flock, and put them in a dry, sheltered coop, far removed from the rest of the poultry. Better kill the bad cases and burn the carcases, and doctor only the lighter cases. Spray their throats, eyes and nostrils with a strong solution of permanganate of potassium or dioxogen, morning, noon and night for two weeks. Feed lightly on nourishing food.

B. H.—Another case of roup. Your treatment was good, and being administered at once, has probably checked the outbreak. As your neighbor's chickens are suffering in the same way, you had better keep yours confined to the house and yard for the rest of the winter, and be very careful to keep up a constant fight against infection. Read answer to G. M. S. in this number.

COMFORT Readers Tell How They Succeeded With Their Incubators

With the prevailing high prices of eggs and dressed poultry the keeping of hens becomes a specially attractive proposition both as a source of income and as a means of economy in supplying the home table, and incidentally the incubator question assumes uncommon interest.

In a recently published interview Champ Clark, Speaker of the House of Representatives, after expressing his doubts as to the efficacy of the proposed legislation designed to reduce food prices, urged that everybody who possibly could should keep hens as an effective means of reducing the cost of living. We believe his advice is sound.

Those who keep hens or contemplate doing so will find profitable information in the experiences of some of our poultry-raising subscribers in the use of incubators as told by them in the following letters. These and other letters which we shall publish later were written in response to COMFORT'S offer of prizes, last June, for best articles on

"How I Succeeded With My Incubator"

Busy Farm Woman Found Incubator an Absolute Necessity

It wasn't because of not having enough to do at home that I went into the poultry business. I am the mother of six big, healthy children, from 12 months to 12 years of age and we live on an 80-acre farm. So I can generally keep busy.

Before I went into poultry raising I often used to wonder if I could make a good living for my large family if I should suddenly be left a widow. To answer the question I went into the poultry business. And now I know the answer is "Yes."

Why, during the month this is written (April, 1916), I sold 187¼ dozen eggs, besides some, (not many) we used, several settings I sold and a setting of 108 eggs for my own incubator.

And now, having told you why I started in the poultry business, I will tell you how. After picking up a little stock I bought an incubator—a standard, advertised make. As I had no place for it I set it in the house where the constant jiggle and jar were awful. The machine was hardly any care, cleaning the lamp and filling, turning the eggs by setting the tray on the incubator and turning them by hand.

The incubator did the rest and regulated itself to the dot. But often during the day I opened the machine gently moving the eggs with the palm of my hand, thus giving them lots of air and "mothering."

It hatched almost as many chicks as a hen does. I had 69 strong, lively chicks from 108 eggs. Many were dead in the shell, but it was hard to save the eggs in the cold weather and they probably were chilled. After this trial I set my incubator in a small cave or "root cellar" where I have successfully run it two hatches with about the same results.

I have found that an incubator is an absolute necessity to the busy farm woman who insists on her own money and who is training children. It makes children systematic to have a definite time to care for the incubator, it teaches cleanliness and patience and it's above all a machine and all children love to run machines. An incubator hatches every egg that a hen would. I have a friend with a better place for her machine, who has hatched 90 and 98 chicks from 108 eggs. It is a great labor saver for it regulates itself and if lamp and wick are clean and the lamp filled you will find it just to the dot six or ten hours later.

To compare my machine to a most reliable setting hen seems to me wrong. For setting hens are queer, like women, while an incubator is just what you make it. It is your fault if it smokes, your fault if it leaks, or whatever is the matter.

With a hen it is different. No matter what care you give the hen she may disappoint you the very last day.

I have had so many heart breaks over setting hens that I greatly prefer the incubator over the hens. This spring although I have 100 hens, I have had very few broody hens and without my incubator I would not have what I want.

As far as hatching strong, lively chicks at a time that you want them and also a large number at a time free from lice and mites the incubator is the thing.

MRS. EMMA THURLOW, South Dakota.

Likes Incubator and Tells Why

I have had success with my incubator and prefer it to hens, because:

First: You get earlier chickens. It is an exceptional hen that wants to set before March first.

Second: If you clean the coops thoroughly every day, you will have no trouble with lice on incubator chickens; while, no matter how much care is used with a hen, lice almost always get on them.

Third: The chicks are all small at once and grow up together, thus saving much time and many steps in taking care of them.

Fourth: They are ready for market earlier, by being hatched earlier and bring a better price.

And lastly: An incubator results in a larger per cent of chickens hatched, from the number of eggs set, than if a hen is used. At least this has been my experience.

I bought a 100-egg (hot water heat) incubator. I put it in the cellar even though the weather was extremely cold. It took three days for the machine to heat and the thermometer to reach 100 degrees, the right temperature for putting the eggs into the tray. I kept my heat to 102 degrees to 103 degrees the first week, from 103 degrees to 104 degrees the remaining time and at about 105 degrees while the hatch was coming off. I allowed no other person to go near the machine and attended to every detail myself, for we all know that what is everybody's business is no one's business, so there was never anything forgotten.

Every morning I trimmed and refilled the lamp and turned and aired the eggs. During the real cold weather I aired them about five minutes but as the weather grew warmer I increased the time up until almost half an hour. I sprinkled them twice and just before they started to hatch placed a wet cloth over them for about half an hour. I stopped turning them on the nineteenth day.

My three hatches last year brought me 240 chickens. I saved 215. My first, hatched March 7, sold June 30, weight two and one half pounds each.

Brought 35 cents a pound	$26.60
45 sold July 24 brought 25 cents a pound,	28.12
41 sold Aug. 28 brought 18 cents a pound,	18.45
I had 91 pullets left which I valued at 85 cents each,	77.35
Total,	$150.52

And they cost me:
Eggs for hatching, $5 per hundred,	$15.00
Kerosene for incubator and brooder,	3.60
Oatmeal,	1.00
Grit,	.75
Chick feed,	10.00
Incubator and brooder,	13.00
	$43.35	$43.35
Profit,		$107.17

This year I had my own eggs, incubator and brooder. My hatches are as good and I live in a locality where the markets are much better so I expect to make much more.

I have found an incubator a paying investment, if you are willing, to work—not as hard as though you set hens—but nevertheless work.

But what do we accomplish in this world without work anyway? So I would advise every farmer to have an incubator.

EVA S. BRADLEY, Illinois.

Her Two Incubators Return a Handsome Profit

Three years ago my husband was working at the public works at insufficient wages so I was compelled to go out and work by the day or canvas, in order to keep up expenses. Then he got a job on a farm. I had only money enough to buy a few hens the first year but I managed to raise chickens enough for a nice start. The second year I sold enough to buy an incubator. I set it about the middle of March and as it was so easy to take care of I found it less trouble than hens. I set it three times last year, also a few hens and raised over 300 chickens. I sold over $100 worth of chickens, kept the family in eggs and chicken to eat. I clothed myself and children with my money I got for my chickens and saved enough to buy another incubator this year.

In running my incubator I experimented and found several valuable points that helped me very much.

In turning the eggs I found it difficult to tell when I had them all turned just half over and I wanted to be sure. So I took to marking "x" on one side of the eggs and I would turn the x up one time and down the next, so I was then sure they were all turned just right. Now I number them and I turn the numbers up one time and down the next. It makes it interesting to see what numbers are lucky enough to be fertile and what numbers are not.

I prefer home-made brooders for my incubator chicks for I make them so I can clean them thoroughly and often. I sew strips of wool goods, such as pieces of blankets cut in fringe, to a piece of cloth that will just cover my box. This when finished hangs down and serves the purpose of an old hen for the chicks to run under at night. This can be taken off the box and washed and replaced. In the box I cut a door, hinge it and fix a lid for my box and the brooder is complete. These boxes I carry in to a warm room during cold weather; and I do not fear overheating.

I think a 140-egg size incubator the best. I now have two 140-egg incubators.

I think all incubators have their good points and their bad points. But I think success can be attained with most any incubator if we are interested enough in them to do our very best; willing to work hard and study all the poultry departments of the different papers, and try to profit by the helpful hints that others have learned in their experience.

Comfort's League of Cousins

ber of inmates are one thousand and seventeen. It cost the state over three million dollars. It is located at South Stillwater, on a beautiful plateau overlooking the St. Croix river. Huge quantities of binding twine and farm machinery are manufactured by the prisoners. Your nephew, ALVIN HEDSTROM.

Alvin, I wish I could come out and spend a month with you. I would be just tickled to bits to help you gather in your hay and strawberries, and if you provide me with a stepladder I'll just be in my glory picking potatoes off the trees and digging tomatoes out of the deep, rich, loamy Minnesota soil. I'm ever so glad you have had sense enough to organize and through your organization now get a decent price for your produce. In union there is strength. United we stand, divided we fall. That magic word organization Alvin, which has been your salvation has brought about improved living conditions for tens of thousands of people the world over, and not a soul has been harmed. If all men and women, Alvin were like you, passionately fond of books, we should have a reading nation and that would mean a thinking nation, but, alas, the American people are not reading as much as they did a decade ago. The whole country today is pleasure mad. Pleasure is all right in its place but it does not get us anywhere. The money that once went into books and into artistic and beautiful things, pictures, statuary, ceramics and decorations, etc., now goes into the buzz wagon. People who spend every evening of their lives in their cars, and a goodly portion of the day, can't do much reading and have little time for serious thought. A few scan the headlines of the papers or occasionally doze over a magazine story, for all the world's on wheels and the motor car is king. If however the evening isn't favorable for a car ride then the whole family is off to the movies. One in every twenty-five of the inhabitants of this country has an automobile, and twenty-five in every one if you can figure that out have seats at the movies, and only one in five hundred is doing any studying, reading or thinking. Now I'm not knocking the automobile. It is the greatest wonder and benefactor of the age. It would take years to tell all that this annihilator of space has done and is going to do for humanity. But there is a time for everything and everything in its place, and too much mad, aimless rushing hither and thither is not good for anyone. When the silent dope drama of the movies displaces the spoken drama, the drama of Skakespeare, Ibsen, Hauptman, Shaw, and the delightful operas of Gilbert and Sullivan, Offenbach, Audran, and the buzz wagon turns us away from the world's greatest literature, turns us to mere aimless joy riding and junketing, then we have indeed lit upon evil days. Pleasure and the mere pursuit of enjoyment result in mental stagnation. It is useless to keep the body moving, if you don't keep the mind moving too. Pleasure madness scoffs at conventionalities, breaks down sex barriers and scorns our old-fashioned ideals of morality, delicacy and modesty. All work and no play make Jack a dull boy, and all play and no reading and studying, no rest, no spiritual life make Jack not only dull, but vicious, immoral and dangerous. It is mighty hard to live a well-balanced life. Few have the opportunity to live such lives, even if they had the desire, and all who have the ability and opportunity should try and live their lives rationally and sensibly. If you need health of the body you must have a well-balanced diet. You must have food that produces so much heat, fat and muscle, so many red blood corpuscles, so that the brain and nerves the blood and tissue, can all be stimulated and

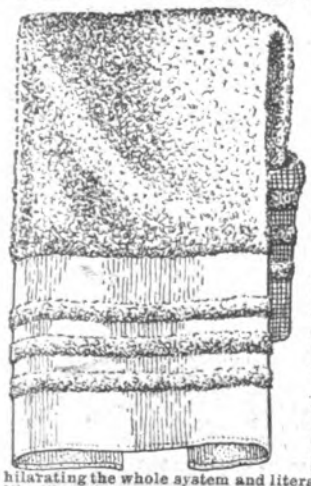
German Silver Mesh Purse



THIS is the new "Gate Top" mesh purse with a ten-inch wrist chain, made throughout of German Silver, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. You can have one of them free by taking advantage of the following CLUB OFFER. For a club of two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you this handsome and stylish German silver mesh purse free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 7362.

Pair Of Turkish Towels

Premium No. 7302

For Two Subscriptions

AFTER bathing there is nothing quite as fine as a good rub down with a Turkish towel, in fact it is the best towel for all purposes, whether for the bath, or guestroom or for everyday family use in the lavatory, kitchen or pantry. They absorb the water much more readily than other towels and the thick, heavy fleece-like surface imparts to the body a delightful feeling of warmth and well-being, exhilarating the whole system and literally making one feel like "jumping over a high board fence." These towels are also great for baby's toilet as they will not hurt the tender skin. The towels we offer here are genuine Turkish towels—not the imitation kind—and are 17 inches wide and 36 inches long which is a good convenient size for all-round family use. They are of good weight, well made and finished and are in every respect equal to towels that you would willingly pay $1.00 a pair for in any store. We will make you a present of one pair of these fine Turkish towels upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one three-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you one pair (2) of these towels free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 7302.

Pocket Flashlight

Premium No. 7083

Given For A Club Of Three

THERE are so many occasions when a flashlight is a necessity it would be impossible to name them all but there is one thing sure—it is the handiest and safest means of illuminating ever devised. We offer here one of the best pocket flashlights made. It is known as the "Eveready," which is certainly an appropriate name as it is always ready when you want to use it. But the greatest feature of this flashlight is its safety around inflammable material. In the house it lights up the darkest rooms or clothes closets, dark corners in the basement, in the garret; it may be used around gasoline, or powder, in the stable, in the barn, even in the hay mow, and there is not the slightest danger of fire. It throws a shaft of steady brilliance right in the teeth of wind or rain. The mere pressure of your finger starts and stops the light at your will and it is so small and compact that you can carry it around in your vest pocket where it does not take up any more room than a cigarette box. The "Eveready" is beautifully finished in polished nickel with a hinged bottom which opens to replace the battery and is equipped with a push button as well as a sliding switch for a flash or continuous light. It is equipped with a Tungsten battery and bulb and gives a surprisingly powerful bright light and the battery with average use will last from two to four months. When one battery becomes exhausted you can easily buy another one anywhere as they are on sale in every city and town in the United States. Or, if you prefer, we will furnish you with additional batteries free of cost in return for a few subscriptions to COMFORT. We will send you this flashlight with battery and bulb complete, ready for business as soon as you receive it, upon the terms of the following

CLUB OFFER. For a club of only three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you one "Eveready" flashlight as described above free by Parcel Post prepaid. (Premium No. 7083.) We can also supply you with extra batteries for the "Eveready" at the rate of one battery free for a club of two one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each. (Premium No. 7092.)

Comfort's Home Lawyer

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

Mrs. F. K., West Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that it would first be necessary to proceed against the administratrix of your father's estate and exhaust the remedy against her before proceeding against her bondsmen in case she has not turned over the shares in the estate to the persons entitled; we are unable to form an opinion from the information you supply us as to whether your sister has released her claim against the estate or as to whether her claim has been barred by the statute of limitations.

Mrs. W. T. H., Virginia.—Under the laws of Oklahoma we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, and leaving as his only heirs at law and next of kin a widow and two sisters his estate would go one half to the surviving widow, and the other half in equal shares to the sisters; we think he could legally, by will, give the whole estate to his surviving widow absolutely and in such a manner that she could exercise all rights of absolute ownership over the property; we think that upon his death the will should be filed in the county where he resided at the time of his death, and would become a public record.

W. K., Kansas.—We think the best way to operate business under a company name is to form a corporation and transact business as a corporation.

G. H. A., Pennsylvania.—We think it would be difficult for you to collect damages from your neighbor for killing your dog while trespassing upon his property, provided you were in the habit of allowing the dog to do so; if however, you can substantiate that you were in the habit of keeping your dog confined to your own premises, and that your neighbor lured him upon his property and killed him, I think you would be entitled to damages; we do not think your neighbor would in any event be entitled to the dog's skin. We think his only possible claim against you would be one for such damages as he suffered by reason of the dog's trespassing upon his property, or for some act committed by the dog.

Mrs. H. S., Minnesota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a surviving widow and children, his widow would receive a life estate in the homestead property and a one third interest absolutely of all the other property in the estate, the remainder going in equal shares to his children, regardless of whether they were children of the surviving widow or by a former wife. We do not think the widow's child by a former marriage would have any intestacy rights in the stepfather's estate.

Mrs. A. H. S., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man or woman, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant the whole of the estate to the amount of seven thousand five hundred dollars after the payment of debts and administration expenses and one half of all the estate in excess of said amount shall go to the surviving spouse and the other one half of said excess shall go to the parents. We think that if you desire to leave a will you should employ some local lawyer or other competent person to draw and attend to the signing of same. We do not think there is any fixed charge for such a service.

Miss B. G., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a married woman can hold real or personal property separate and apart from her husband and free from his debts, except that her real estate is liable for the necessaries of the family and for improvements thereon and that she can make same liable for her husband's debts by acts of her own. We think that both husband and wife must sign deed to convey good title of the real estate belonging to the wife.

C. B. H., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that a father can be compelled t support his minor children of tender years, who are unable to support themselves, and that a man can be compelled to support his wife unless she deserts or abandons him without just cause, or unless she has separate property adequate to provide for her own support.

Mrs. J. F., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a married woman cannot by will bar her husband from a life estate in her real estate, as tenant by the curtesy, in case he survives her.

Mrs. W. P., Hampshire, Ill.—Upon your statements, I am of the opinion, that after a lapse of fourteen years, it would probably be difficult for you to establish any rights in your father's estate, but a search of the records as to just what was done in the matter would be necessary to ascertain just exactly what rights you may have in the matter.

Mrs. J. G., Kimmswick, Mo.—Upon your statements, I am of the opinion that there has been a recent law passed increasing the pension of the widows of Civil War Veterans on the Union side, in some cases. I think you should communicate with the Pension Department for full information as to this. You do not supply me with enough information for me to form an opinion as to whether this increase would apply to your case.

Miss G., Springfield, Ohio. Upon your statements, I am of the opinion, that the parents are the natural guardians of their infant children. If the mother of the child you mention is dead, I think the father would be entitled to the child's custody and control. I think that upon the death of the father, the guardianship of the child would go to such person or persons as the parent might name in a last will and testament, provided such person is a fit person to have such guardianship. In the absence of such disposition, I think the appointment would be discretionary with the court who would select some person (relatives of the child having the preference), as would be for the child's best interest.

C. L. B., Waynesboro, Tenn.—I have no personal knowledge of any company or association in the United States that makes a specialty of locating "Unknown heirs," which I would care to recommend.

Mrs. L., Lynchburg, Va.—Upon your statements, I am of the opinion, that it is possible to have a deed of real estate drawn to the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety, so that upon the death of one, the whole property becomes the sole property of the survivor, without any administration of the decedent's estate. I think it is also possible to have bank accounts made and mortgages drawn in joint names, so that upon the death of one of the persons named therein, the whole property would become the sole property of the survivor. As to whether this has been done in your case, I am unable to form an opinion without an examination of the papers in connection therewith.

W. U. C., Ill.—Upon your statements, I am of the opinion that if the company who put the roof on your house did not comply with the terms of contract for roofing said house it would not be entitled to payment for such services until it had made the job conform to its contract, unless, of course, you have accepted the job and waived the defects in workmanship. Of course if your contract is defective and it has complied with the terms thereof, it would be entitled to its pay from you. I think that, if the paper you enclose is a copy of your contract, it would be bound to roof the house with the brand of roof specified as "Red D," so that the same would not leak through faulty material or workmanship before it would be entitled to its pay.

Mrs. C. C., Colo.—You do not furnish me with enough information for me to form an opinion as to the nature of the transaction you describe. If you sent some real estate broker a deed to your property for him to sell same and he has been unable to effect the sale, I think you are entitled to the return of your deed. If this deed has been recorded in his name and he has not paid you for the property, I think you should have him re-deed the property to you making sure that the property had in no way been encumbered during the time he held title to same. I think you could find out as to this through a search of the records where the deed was recorded, if same has been recorded. To deed property to a broker or other agent who is trying to make a sale is bad practise and risky.

Girls—Here Is A Beautiful Home For All Your Dollies

This Big Doll House Is Just What You Have Always Wanted

Looks Just Like A Real House With Yard,

Premium No. 7921

Flowers And Windows And Doors That Actually Open And Shut

COMFORT loves little children and never loses an opportunity to please them, so when we had this large magnificent doll house offered us at a special reduced price you may be sure that we took up all that we could buy of them. You never saw a finer doll house than this one. It is not one of the small toy-like affairs that are not large enough to be of any account when you want to really and truly "play house." You will be surprised and delighted to see how much like a real house it looks and with the large size of it—over one foot high, a foot long, nearly ten inches wide, and of course the dooryard that extends clear around the house makes it still larger, and it looks like a real yard, too, with beautiful flower beds laid out, walks and handsome green climbing vines that come way up over the windows. It is built of very heavy folding cardboard in true colonial style just like the houses that rich people live in, with a large porch, plenty of windows that open outward, and doors that actually open and shut. The sides of the house and the chimney are painted a handsome bright red, the roof is light green while all the windows and doors are finished in white.

No little girlie ever had a larger or prettier doll house than this one and all your dollies will certainly feel very proud of such a beautiful home to live in. We are certainly pleased that we are able to make so many little ones happy with a present of one of these fine houses, and we are sure that every mother who sends for one will be as well pleased as the children. We will give you this doll house which comes all folded and ready to easily set up all ready for housekeeping, upon the terms of either of the following special offers.

Offer No. 7921A For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25c, we will send you this large beautiful doll house free by parcel post prepaid.

Offer No. 7921B For your own subscription, or renewal, or extension of your present subscription, for one year at 25c and 10c additional, (35c in all) we will send you this doll house free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7921.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Mrs. T., Oak Mills, Kans.—There are in the neighborhood of three hundred periodicals of various kinds in the United States owned and published by colored people, a large part of them being religious. They are to be found in thirty-five states and the District of Columbia, with Mississippi leading with thirty-one and Alabama second with twenty-three,—our list, however, is not recent. Of the Western states Oklahoma leads with thirteen and of the Eastern states, Pennsylvania with eleven. The total negro population in the United States in 1910 was 9,827,763. Washington with a population of 331,069 contains the largest number of negroes, 94,446, while Lowell, Mass., with a population of 106,294 contains the smallest number only 133. Mississippi leading with 31 publications also leads in negro population with 1,009,487, or, say, about 33,333 people to each publication.

Mrs. J. R., Tibbee Station, Miss.—Mr. Henry Ford, the well-known pacifist, was born at Greenfield, Mich. July 30, 1863, and learned the machinist's trade. He has made more money at it than any man ever did before and in less time.

W. L., Whiteville, Tenn.—Few substances are magnetic in the sense of being attracted by a magnet, but magnetic attraction acts through any and all substances. A magnet on one side of a sheet of glass will attract iron on the other side as though the glass was not between. (2) The only licenses required to sell articles advertised in COMFORT are of a local character if they exist at all, which usually they do not. Ask your town officer if Whiteville requires a license.

Anxious, Sunnyfield, Ill.—Unless you have a reputation as a public speaker or lecturer, there is no chance for you to get such a position as you seek because there are hundreds of speakers and lecturers of experience who want something to do in their line. This is an age of efficiency and only efficients have the call.

J. Y., Ireland, Texas.—The popular interpretation of Mizpah is "The Lord watch between me and thee while we two are parted." Look it up in your Bible. Didn't you know it was a Bible word?

Bookworm, Wilton, Wis.—There have been thousands of pictures painted with Christ as the subject and some of them may bear the title "The Coming of Christ," but we do not now recall one that is "considered a magnificent creation." Some of the Christ pictures of the old masters were and are magnificent creations, but not under the title you give.

L. E. S., Silverton, Oregon.—The beginner who is so wholly lacking in literary information as you are is wasting time, paper, postage and all the rest of it trying to write salable stories. You might as well try to raise pumpkins on pine trees. The highest order of intelligence is required in such work with the added faculty that must be born in the writer. COMFORT readers with literary aspirations please take notice.

H. S., Farmer, S. Dak.—Encyclopedias range in price from a few dollars to two hundred dollars and up, and a cheap one is often all that the average man wants. We recommend buying as good as you can afford, but an expensive and extensive encyclopedia is too much of a good thing for persons of little reading time and small means. Latest editions of encyclopedias are always expensive, but to the ordinary reader earlier editions answer every purpose and they can be bought at second-hand stores at ridiculously low prices. There should be in every family of fair intelligence a cyclopedia of some sort and it should be in daily use by all members of the family. These books contain the world's information and nobody need be wholly ignorant who will read a little in them every day.

J. D. R., Lowry, S. Dak.—We have never heard of anything that would remove skunk odor from clothing or other articles except fire or burial in the earth. It will wear off of the hands or skin in time, and time is the only thing we know of that will kill it. If any COMFORT reader knows of a real deodorizer we wish he would write and tell us what it is.

S. L. D., DeKalb, Ill.—It is quite commendable to adopt a child and we think more people should do it than do, but do not go to the city for them, or any farther away from your own home than possible. Much depends upon what the child is in its breeding and you can learn more of the child's forbears if you get one somewhere near you. You run great risk in any event, but it is less if you will make an intelligent start. Many of the city children will be guaranteed by the organizations sending them out which lessens the risk materially, but more will not because they have no knowledge on which to base a guarantee.

Mary Jones, Wooster, Ohio.—Before trying to dispose of your old book take it to your city librarian and get an opinion on its value. There are millions of old books for sale and only the fewest of them are worth more than old paper. (2) Cats to have any large value, or any fancy value at all, must have a pedigree. Mere beauty might sell a cat for ten dollars while if a pedigree went with the beauty it might bring a hundred times as much. Persian cats at fifty thousand dollars per cat are few enough to be counted on the fingers of an armless person. (2) President Wilson's appointees are naturally favorable to his brand of politics, but he does not consider his religion at all in making them. Incidentally we may say to you that if you asked as many questions of Wooster people as you do of us, you would learn ten times as much because Wooster ranks high as a city of intelligence. Evidently you have not lived there long enough to avail yourself of its well-known advantages.
